Dear Boyden:

This may be of special interest to you. You'll note that I have discussed it with President Ford who thinks it's something that might be worthy of consideration if we can in fact get key Democrats to join with Republicans in the effort.

There was a similar program for the Panama Canal Treaty. I can mention to you certain factors that involve how the White House relates to such an effort, should the President be interested in pursuing it.

Sincerely,

John O. Marsh, Jr.

The Honorable George Bush
President of the United States
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue
Washington, D. C. 20500

Dear Mr. President:

The subject of this letter has been discussed with President Ford who thought it would be helpful to bring it to your attention for follow-up, if you concur.

First, I want to commend you, and those working with you, for the exemplary way you have conducted United States efforts in the current crisis in the Gulf. Your successful endeavors to bring to bear diplomatic, economic and military means have been extraordinary. These efforts have gained the respect and support of Americans across the political spectrum. It is vital this well-deserved support continue.

On Friday I received a call from a person long active in what would be clearly the liberal wing of the Democratic party. He wanted me to know he supported your efforts in this crisis. This support he said existed to an extent greater than you might suspect in what might be considered the Democratic "left." Indeed it was his view that a number of responsible and respected liberals could be enlisted to publicly speak out with conservatives in support of your policies and the course you are pursuing.

However, it was also his view this support must be pulled together, or at least informally organized, to develop public opinion, not just for the short term, but possibly for a sustained period. To this end his suggestion was to organize in the private sector a broadly-based citizens coalition. This coalition would be composed of leaders from many fields - Republicans and Democrats - whose purpose would be to educate and focus our citizens on our goals in the Middle East situation. It would be a bi-partisan effort similar to other coalition endeavors established in the past to build unity in pursuit of national goals. For example, in World War II, and later in support of the Atlantic Alliance.

In an honorary leadership role might be former national leaders, who are joined by educators, and representatives from business and labor, together with retired members of the diplomatic corps and military community. I would also add individuals from the political field who have a record in bipartisan efforts, such as Bob Strauss, Howard Baker, Clark Clifford, or Mel Laird. Lud Ashley might have suggestions on this matter. Because of the violence being done to the rule of law, distinguished members of the American Bar versed in national security matters such as Medal of Freedom holder Morry Leibman should be enlisted to assist in forming a blue ribbon panel.

Already, as you know better than I, we are beginning to hear the distant rumble of the drums of dissent, which will no doubt become louder as the crisis is prolonged. Therefore, it is even more imperative our citizens clearly understand the vital interests at stake, as well as the necessity for the United States to assume a leadership role in meeting these international responsibilities, and why we must stay the course you have charted.

A citizens group organized in the private sector, sustained by funds it raises on its own behalf, but enjoying the quiet support of the administration to achieve a mutual goal, can assist in the vital task of building and sustaining public opinion. Such an endeavor is not unique but has been done before. It is needed now. I believe there are many Americans from all walks of life who would be willing to help because they want you and the Country to succeed in meeting this critical challenge.

In addition to President Ford, I have sent a copy of this letter to John Sununu, Brent Scowcroft and Boyden Gray.

Sincerely,

John O. Marsh, Jr.
