A Foreign Service spouse with considerable experience in moving, Wendy Walker has spent more than half her life abroad, mainly in the Middle East.

Born in England and educated R.A.F. style at numerous bases, Mrs. Walker joined the British Foreign Office in 1967 as a secretary and was posted first to Dar as Salaam and then to Tel Aviv where she met Ned Walker. They married in Jerusalem in 1973 and then she came to the States for the first time that year. She became a naturalized American citizen in 1973.

Evacuated from Beirut in 1975 she helped move the Foreign Service Institute Beirut school to Tunis in 1975 and then continued onto Cairo with Mr. Walker the same year to finish Arabic studies. After a follow-up tour in Damascus (1977-1979) the Walkers returned to the States to adopt two children (Katie, born in Colombia in 1981) and Christopher (born in Washington in 1982).

In 1984 the family moved to London for a year (Royal College of Defense Studies) and then went on to Riyadh (1985-1988) and Abu Dhabi (1989-1992). During these years Mrs. Walker, in addition to her duties as the wife of a diplomat, ran the small Foreign Buildings Office (FBO) in the Embassy during the construction of new housing, worked for a short time in an American law firm, helped with a research project at the Documentation and Research Center and volunteered at the American School during the Gulf War. She also volunteered with a group visiting severely handicapped children and, during the war, encouraged the community to support the American troops passing through the area.

In 1992, the family returned to the States and went to New York in January 1993 where Ambassador Walker was Deputy Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations. During this short tour Mrs. Walker worked in a law firm and chose to volunteer among the homeless at night. Just over a year later she packed the family up for Cairo.

In Cairo Mrs. Walker is back to her Arabic studies while pursuing a Bachelor's degree in sociology through the University of Maryland overseas program.

Women in Egyptian Society

Egyptian law provides for equality of the sexes, but aspects of the law and many traditional practices discriminate against women.

Egyptian women have employment opportunities in government, medicine, law, academia, the arts, and, to a lesser degree, in business. About 100 officers in the Egyptian diplomatic service are women, including 3 ambassadors. Social pressure against pursuing a career remains strong, however, and some Egyptian feminists say that a resurgent Islamic fundamentalist trend limits further gains. Women's rights advocates also point to other discriminatory attitudes and practices such as female circumcision and the male relative's role in enforcing women's compliance with religiously prescribed codes of sexual conduct.

Women generally do not hold positions of senior leadership in the Egyptian government or political parties. The Constitution reserves ten (out of 454) People's Assembly seats for presidential appointees, which assures some representation for women. Ten women hold Assembly seats: seven elected and three appointed.

Laws affecting marriage and personal status generally correspond to an individual's religion, which for most Egyptians is Islam. A 1979 liberalization of the family status law strengthened a Muslim woman's rights to divorce and to child custody, but in 1985 the changes were found unconstitutional on grounds that they conflicted with Islamic law and were repealed.

There are at least two active women's rights groups in Egypt, one affiliated with the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights. The other is the Communications Group for the Enhancement of the Status of Women, which has published a booklet on the legal rights of Egyptian women.

(The above text is excerpted from the 1993 Human Rights Report)

B. HEALTH SECTOR PROFILE

Health standards continue to be a serious problem in Egypt, resulting in reduced productivity, depressed quality of life and lower life expectancy. The four leading causes of death for Egyptians of all ages are chronic heart disease, lung disease, infectious diseases and accidents. Debilitating parasitic (schistosomiasis), bacterial (typhoid, TB) and viral (hepatitis) diseases are endemic among the adult population. Maternal deaths due to childbirth are still high at 184 per 100,000 live births. Schistosomiasis is an important, but steadily declining, cause of morbidity for all age groups. Waterborne gastrointestinal diseases strike all age groups. Prior to the national oral rehydration program, 50% of all deaths were of children under age five, and half of those were due to diarrhea. Acute respiratory infections now rank first among causes of child death. Malnutrition has been greatly reduced through the GOE's subsidy of basic foodstuffs, but there is still significant maternal and child malnutrition due to iron deficiency, poor weaning practices and intestinal disease.

The GOE has long given high priority to the provision of public health services. Over 3,200 clinics, 314 community hospitals, and about 50 modern urban hospitals give most Egyptians access to some sort of health care. The doctor to population ratio is among the best in the developing world. However, poor quality of the public health care system, especially in primary care, results in under utilization of public health facilities. The GOE acknowledges that its health services must be improved and is facilitating change. Preventive health programs, particularly child survival programs such as immunization and oral rehydration therapy (ORT) are gaining priority but are still underfunded. A very high proportion of public health resources support expensive curative care efforts.

The Ministry of Health plans to introduce cost recovery mechanisms and to shift more curative health services to the private sector. The current five-year health plan (1992-1997), emphasizes the importance of preventive health care but budgetary allocations favor hospital services. More aggressive programs in reproductive health and family planning, prevention of micronutrient deficiencies and other interventions that protect maternal and child health are needed. USAID's projects in this sector support preventive care, including immunizations, treatment of acute respiratory infections, and child spacing.

In order to ensure the sustainability of improved health care, USAID is helping the GOE establish a rational financing system for health services, emphasizing cost recovery for curative care, greater GOE allocations for maternal and child health programs, and greater participation of the private sector in the provision of all health services.

EDUCATION SECTOR PROFILE

Egypt's educational system does not contribute as much as it should to rapid economic growth. Nor does it allow the majority of Egyptians to attain their full human potential. Some of the problems Egypt faces in this sector are: inadequate physical facilities; increasing enrollments without a commensurate increase in resources devoted to the educational system; inadequate access to schools, especially in rural areas; limited equipment and books available to students at all levels; and poor quality of instruction. This contributes to a high primary school dropout rate and poor learning at all levels. When USAID began project assistance in this sector, first grade enrollment was below 83 percent.

In his first speech after re-election in October 1987, President Mubarak identified educational reform as one of the four areas requiring major national efforts (the other three being health, housing and tourism). The Ministry of Education has embarked on a major effort to formulate a strategy for educational reform. The strategy is designed to provide sufficient funds for school buildings to reduce crowding, to enhance technical education at secondary and higher educational levels and to upgrade and train teachers.

USAID has provided $375 million of education and training since 1975. In a major effort to increase primary school enrollments, USAID is building 1,800 schools in rural areas currently underserved (e.g. the nearest school is at least five kilometers away). Over 1,000 schools have been completed and new schools are being built at a rate of one per day. The impact on primary school enrollments is striking. In the three years since the first schools were completed, boys' first grade enrollment in those catchment areas increased 15 percent. Girls' first grade enrollment increased much more -- 29 percent. Dropout rates in grades two through six decreased at a rate of six percent for boys and 17 percent for girls. Dropout rates are reduced markedly as schools are built nearer to where children live.

Since 1975, USAID has financed over 8,500 participants in academic and technical training in the U.S. USAID's contribution to university education and research has been through the linking of U.S. and Egyptian universities for developmental research activities. The projects in this sector, and in the Science and Technology and Agriculture sectors, have helped develop relationships between U.S. and Egyptian scientists that strengthen the capabilities of Egyptian research institutions to engage in applied research.

The standard Egyptian medical school curriculum provides little exposure to patients or patient care, and none at all to primary health care services. In a significant break with tradition, the Suez Canal Area Medical Education and Health Services project has developed a six-year course of studies in the Suez Canal University Faculty of Medicine that provides greater student exposure to local health needs. First year students are placed in rural and urban health facilities. Patient health problems serve as basic learning units. As the students progress, they receive greater patient exposure and, ultimately, responsibility for diagnosing and recommending patient treatment. Out of 50 students who entered in the first year, 44 students or close to 90 percent graduated in 1988. Forty-five percent of the students are female.

A. POPULATION SECTOR PROFILE

Despite dramatic gains in the use of family planning, Egypt's annual population growth rate, reported by the GOE to be 2.3 percent in 1991, remains one of the central constraints to the country's economic growth. The negative effects of high fertility are evident in many aspects of Egyptian life: population distribution, education, employment and health. Acknowledging that rapid population growth rates jeopardize all of Egypt's development efforts, the GOE currently invests substantially in family planning services. The President and influential religious leaders like the Grand Mufti and the Pope of the Coptic Church frequently call attention to the importance of family planning.

Since 1975, USAID has been the largest single donor to Egypt's family planning program providing about 75% of all donor assistance. As such, AID's strategy is to assist the GOE in establishing effective population policies; assure an adequate supply of contraceptives and related supplies; improve access to family planning services and information through the public and private sectors; improve the quality of service delivery and contraceptive use; and develop program coordination, management and information systems.

USAID has spent approximately $170 million to establish an institutional framework for family planning, train Egyptian health personnel in family planning, promote and distribute contraceptive methods, provide the needed research base (both operations and applied biomedical), and to make quality services more available and accessible. In 1987, project efforts were reviewed and revised to put priority on the delivery of quality family planning services which are accessible and emphasize longer acting methods. Documentary evidence from recent evaluations suggests that the positive achievements of the program are directly associated with this strategic emphasis. With these successes in expanding population and family planning programs, a new set of implementation issues arose. The Population/Family Planning III Project addresses these issues by building on the successes of Population/Family Planning II and by utilizing a more focused and consolidated approach.

HEADLINE: Women rally for equality

SOURCE: AL AHRAM WEEKLY

BODY:

Seeking a better future for women, delegates met in Cairo this week. Rania Khallaf covers the conference chaired by Mrs Mubarak:

Hundreds of women, including community activists scholars and politicians gathered in Cairo this week for the First National Women's Conference. Coming from the country's 26 governorates, the delegates met at Cairo University for the intensive three-day conference on "Egyptian women and the challenges of the 21st century". Organised by the Egyptian National Women's Council and chaired by Mrs Suzanne Mubarak, the conference sought solutions that would ensure greater equality for women and greater participation in politics and national production.

The conference drew to a close last night by issuing a declaration which Mrs Mubarak read out and which included a series of recommendations designed to improve women's conditions and remove any legal distinctions between man and woman.

The conference recommended that all laws be revised to "remove any reference to man-woman distinctions" but added that this should be done "within the framework of our religious and ethical values cultural heritage and political, economic and social conditions".

The conference made particular mention of the personal status law. It said some articles of this law "should be studied objectively to safeguard the rights of women". The provisions of marriage and divorce contracts should be revised and the litigation process should be made easier to make it possible for women to regain their rights "within a reasonable period of time", the recommendation said.

Another recommendation emphasised the importance of women's participation in politics. This, it said, should be accomplished by urging women to register themselves as voters and by devoting greater attention to their political education.

Combating women's illiteracy was also the subject of attention. The recommendations said that illiteracy should be viewed as a "principal challenge facing Egyptian women and that effective methods and a time-plan should be devise to eradicate illiteracy within the coming years".

The conference declared 16 March of each year as "Egyptian Woman's Day". On that day in 1919, Egyptian women staged their first demonstration in modern history to protest the continued British occupation of Egypt. LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

HEADLINE: NGOs pressure governments on global population strategy in Cairo

DATELINE: Cairo, Sept 4

BODY:

Representatives of Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs) vowed in Cairo Sunday to maintain pressure on governments to implement the draft plan of the U.N. Conference on Population and Development for a less crowded and more equitable world.

Several thousand NGO members attended the opening of a parallel forum at a Cairo stadium near where officials from 170 countries, led by Egypt's President Hosny Mubarak and U.S. Vice President Al Gore, will formally launch the nine-day U.N. conference on Monday.

The main theme is a new strategy to stabilise the population of the world within the framework of a global plan for better education, health services and equality for women.

The packed stadium was addressed by Mrs. Suzanne Mubarak, Mrs. Tipper Gore, NGO Chairperson Florence Manguyu, Executive Director of the U.N. Population Fund Mrs. Nafis Sadik, and by two men - Fred Sai, President of the International Planned Parenthood Federation and Egypt's Planning Minister Maher Mahran, who both joked about having been nudged to the bottom of the speakers' list.

Manguyu won an ovation from the mainly female audience when she said, in a wavering voice, "that women are deeply hurt and feel betrayed by our men for failing in the responsibility of providing protection for women and children and by allowing conflicts in the world ..."

"The world is in our hands," declared Manguyu, insisting that women be given a full role of partnership in managing the world. "Let us hold hands in friendship and move forward."

She said the NGOs would see to it that recommendations for equality andeducation for women were implemented so that females were not given a type of education that engrains a "subservient role" in their minds.

Mrs. Gore spoke emotionally about her visit to refugees in Rwanda, an African country which she said represented not only a tragedy but a warning to the rest of the world.

"No nation dies in isolation," she said. "When the bells toll for a country... the bells toll for all of us."

Mrs. Sadik castigated groups which alleged that the conference's draft Programme of Action was aimed at legalising abortion and spreading sexual education to facilitate teenage sex.

She said that half a million women died each year from pregnancy-related causes, 99 per cent from them in the developing countries - a ratio of one in 20 as compared with one in 10,000 in the industrialised world.

Abortion alone accounted for 200 deaths every day, she said, adding that the draft's emphasis was on reproductive health, on stopping the "completely preventable" deaths and on ensuring safe motherhood.

"How can any one in the world be against that from a moral or ethical point of view," she asked as the delegates enthusiastically applauded.

Mrs. Mubarak stressed the voluntary nature of birth control campaigns in Egypt which she said was instrumental in their success. She warned of a "values crisis" in the world as a result of the switch to high-tech and privatised industries, warning that this could be exploited by radical groups if proper social safeguards were not introduced.

Sai said the delegates were confident that the divergent viewpoints at the Cairo conference could be harmonised, "but however harmonious this piece of music is it will be useless if you do not hold governments committed to it." dpa pt

SCENE SETTER: THE PYRAMIDS
Coffee with Mrs. Suzanne Mubarak
Date: October 26, 1994
The Pyramids, Giza, Egypt
Time: 8:30 a.m.

The Pyramids of Giza, just outside Cairo, are among the most dramatic and inspiring structures in existence. The only surviving wonder of the ancient world, they are a symbol of Egypt, and they evoke a sense of pride for most Egyptians who regard them as a symbol of continuity and a direct link to Egypt's glorious past. The Giza complex comprises a total of nine pyramids as well as the Sphinx. Taken as a whole, Giza is one of the most impressive sites in the world.

The largest pyramids were built as tombs for three of Egypt's greatest pharaohs, Cheops, Chefren, and Mykerinos. The largest or Great Pyramid of Cheops contained over two million stone blocks, averaging over 2 1/2 tons apiece. Each side measures 746 feet at the base, and now stands 450 feet above ground level. When originally constructed, the Great Pyramid was covered with a smooth limestone casing, and it stood an additional 30 feet higher. Carved from a single outcropping of stone, the Sphinx stands 66 feet high and 240 feet long. The nose was damaged in Mamluk times, but suffered its greatest harm when Napoleon's troops used it for target practice. The six smaller pyramids at Giza were built as tombs for wives and family members of the pharaohs.

BACKGROUND ON ISRAELI AND JORDANIAN HEALTH CARE SYSTEMS

In Israel, expenditure on health care is about 8% of GNP; the average annual per capita expenditure on health care of $372 is much lower than in most developed countries.

Israel's two main providers of health care are the Ministry of Health and Kupat Holim or general sick fund. The General Federation of Labor Unions (Histadrut) management of Kupat Holim led to financial crisis in 1992, and despite some steps to control costs, the fund's total debt by 1994 stood at $1.3 billion. Histadrut has successfully opposed government efforts to sever the link between Histadrut finances and those of Kupat Holim; government bailouts and a new national health insurance law (that would generate up to $330 million) still leave the fund with a large operating deficit. Kupat Holim covers 80% of the population and provides prepaid medical hospital, drug, and other services. The Ministry of Health provides most preventive components of primary health care, which are available to all, regardless of health insurance status.

Approximately 25% of services are funded directly by the government; 15% is funded by the public through prepaid voluntary insurance plans, and 30% from employers' obligatory contributions on behalf of their employees; the remainder is received from payments for private services and from various non-profit organizations. Major complaints about the system focus on over-bureaucratization of health care. The recently established National Health Council is designed to be a forum for interagency exchange of views and discussion on health needs and priority programs at national level. There is still a lack of coordination between services and in the comprehensiveness of services, especially at the regional and primary care levels.

The quality of health care in Jordan has improved over the last two decades and is now among the best in the developing world, in many cases approaching levels in industrialized states. Jordan dramatically reduced infant mortality, raising life expectancy, improved rural health services and achieved almost universal access to clean water.

However the influx after the Gulf War of almost 300,000 returnees imposed a severe burden on the country's health care facilities. The government's major challenges include coping with funding shortfalls in the face of increased demand and lack of coordination among public institutions that is raising costs and lowering the quality of care. The government is working on legislation to provide health insurance to all Jordanian citizens and improve basic health services. In 1990, public spending on health services amounted to 6% of GNP.

Jordan has one of the highest population growth rates in the world (3.4%); consequently, both Jordanian government and U.S. AID programs focus heavily on population planning and primary health care.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION FOR LUNCHEON HOSTED BY

MRS. RUMA WEIZMAN
MRS. LEAH RABIN

DATE: OCTOBER 27, 1994

I. CONTEXT

Mrs. Weizman and Mrs. Rabin are both actively involved in charitable organizations designed to improve health care in Israel, especially for women, children, and the elderly.

Israel's health care system is based on a strong social commitment to universal health coverage that dates back to the period of Jewish settlement of the area in the early part of the century. Today, both governmental and non-governmental agencies are active in providing largely prepaid health care to 95% of the population. In general, health care compares favorably with West European standards, and the ratio of physicians to the general population and life expectancy are among the highest in the world, while infant mortality is among the lowest.

II. YOUR OBJECTIVES

In the context of the signing of the peace treaty, which includes a commitment to negotiate a health protocol within nine months, you could initiate a discussion on the prospects of moving forward rapidly in this sector. Another aspect of interest would be the potential impact on national social welfare programs, especially health care cooperation between Israel and Jordan. You should seek their views on what they see as the most fruitful areas for future cooperation. You also might want to discuss priorities for national health care planning in Israel and offer insights from your own experience in this area.

III. CORE POINTS

- o Spending on health care in Israel represents a fairly modest portion of GNP. Do you believe that current spending results in adequate levels of health care?
- o I understand that you have both been very active in health care initiatives.
- o From your own experience, what are some of the chief problems facing the health care system in Israel?

- o What were some of the major factors contributing to the dire financial situation of the general sick fund in Israel?
- o How has the recent influx of immigrants to Israel affected the government's ability to provide health care? What role does the private sector play?
- o What would you suggest in terms of elements that might be included in an Israeli-Jordanian cooperative agreement in the health sector, as envisioned in yesterday's peace treaty?

I. Purpose

To greet Americans living in Israel as well as Americans who have travelled to the Middle East for the signing ceremony.

II. Background

There are approximately 50,000 Americans living in Israel. This is a rare opportunity for them to be received there by the First Lady of the United States.

Both Jews and Palestinians have been invited to this event, although we anticipate that most of the guests will be Jewish. 7

Additionally, American business people who have operations in Israel are being invited to this reception.

Brief, uplifting remarks about the peace process would be most appropriate.
