Draft POTUS Newsweek Op-Ed

This week, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Chairman Yasser
Arafat will come to Camp David at my invitation to seek agreement on the core issues that have fueled a half-century of conflict between Israelis and Palestinians.

Underlying this challenge are the most profound questions -- about beliefs, political identity, and collective fate. Etched in each side's mind are intense fears and emotions and a deep-seated commitment to defend their people's interests. There is clearly no guarantee of success.

So, why this summit and why now? The answer is simple: While Israeli and Palestinian negotiators have made real progress, the most complex and sensitive issues are still unresolved. Success now depends on decisions only the two leaders can make.

For Prime Minister Barak and Chairman Arafat, the challenge is to draw the contours of a long-awaited peace - a peace that can fulfill the Israeli people's quest for security and recognition, genuine reconciliation with Palestinians, and true acceptance in the region -- a peace that can fulfill the Palestinian people's legitimate aspirations to determine their destiny on their own land, and to build a better future.

Neither side can achieve 100 percent of its goals. The optimal solution of each party is, by definition, one the other party cannot and will not accept. Negotiations must create an outcome that is realistic, balanced, and fair; that meets the fundamental objectives of both sides; that reconciles their competing grievances; that strengthens the two parties rather than weakens one of them.

Delay is no longer an option, for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict knows no status quo. It can move forward toward peace, or can slide back into turmoil. It will not stand still. If the parties do not seize this moment to make more progress, there will be more hostility and more bitterness -- perhaps even more violence.

And to what end? Eventually, after more bloodshed and tears, they will have to come back to the negotiating table, where they will face the same history, the same geography, the same passions, the same hatreds and the same tough choices that confront them today. The Israeli and Palestinian people have leaders now who are visionary enough, courageous enough, and capable of building a fair, just, and lasting peace.

In coming here and accepting this challenge, Prime Minister Barak and Chairman Arafat have shown they are ready to take risks to pursue peace. I will be there with them, and I intend to do all I can to help. America has a profound interest in a Middle East whose people are prosperous, at peace, and willing to confront common challenges as partners. For the same reasons, the rest of the world - and especially the rest of the region - cannot afford to be bystanders. For all those who are truly committed to the cause of peace and to the well-being of the Israeli and Palestinian people, now is the time to lend support to the peacemakers.

beliefs,
political identity, and collective fate. Etched in each side's mind are intense
fears and emotions and a deep-seated commitment to defend their
people's
interests. There is clearly no guarantee of success.

So, why this summit and why now? The answer is simple: While Israeli and Palestinian negotiators have made real progress, the most complex
and sensitive
issues are still unresolved. Success now depends on decisions only the two
leaders can make.

For Prime Minister Barak and Chairman Arafat, the challenge is to draw the
contours of a long-awaited peace - a peace that can fulfill the Israeli people's
quest for security and recognition, genuine reconciliation with Palestinians, and true acceptance in the region -- a peace that can fulfill the Palestinian people's legitimate aspirations to determine their destiny on their own land, and to build a better future.

Neither side can achieve 100 percent of its goals. The optimal solution of each party is, by definition, one the other party cannot and will not accept.

Negotiations must create an outcome that is realistic, balanced, and fair; that meets the fundamental objectives of both sides; that reconciles their competing grievances; that strengthens the two parties rather than weakens one of them.

Delay is no longer an option, for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict knows no status quo. It can move forward toward peace, or can slide back into turmoil.
It will not stand still. If the parties do not seize this moment to make more progress, there will be more hostility and more bitterness -- perhaps even more violence.

And to what end? Eventually, after more bloodshed and tears, they will have to come back to the negotiating table, where they will face the same history, the same geography, the same passions, the same hatreds and the same choices that confront them today. The Israeli and Palestinian people have leaders now who are visionary enough, courageous enough, and capable of building a fair, just, and lasting peace.

In coming here and accepting this challenge, Prime Minister Barak and Chairman Arafat have shown they are ready to take risks to pursue peace. I will be there with them, and I intend to do all I can to help. America has a profound interest in a Middle East whose people are prosperous, at peace, and willing to confront common challenges as partners. For the same reasons, the rest of the world - and especially the rest of the region - cannot afford to be bystanders. For

This week, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat will come to Camp David at my invitation to seek agreement on the core issues that have fueled a half-century of conflict between Israelis and Palestinians.

Underlying this challenge are the most profound questions -- about beliefs, political identity, and collective fate. Etched in each side's mind are intense fears and emotions and a deep-seated commitment to defend their people's interests.

So, why this summit and why now? The answer is simple: While Israeli and Palestinian negotiators have made real progress, the most complex and sensitive issues are still unresolved. Success now depends on decisions only the two leaders can make. While there clearly is no guarantee of success, not to try would guarantee failure.

Delay is no longer an option, for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict knows no status quo. It can move forward toward peace, or can slide back into turmoil. It will not stand still. If the parties do not seize this moment to make more progress, there will be more hostility and more bitterness -- perhaps even more violence.

And to what end? Eventually, after more bloodshed and tears, they will have to come back to the negotiating table, where they will face the same history, the same geography, the same passions, the same hatreds and the same tough choices that confront them now. Those choices are far better made today.

For Prime Minister Barak and Chairman Arafat, the challenge is to draw the contours of a long-awaited peace - a peace that can fulfill the Israeli people's quest for security and recognition, genuine reconciliation with Palestinians, and true acceptance in the region -- a peace that can fulfill the Palestinian people's legitimate aspirations to determine their destiny on their own land, and to build a better future.

Neither side can achieve 100 percent of its goals. The optimal solution of each party is, by definition, one the other party cannot and will not accept. Negotiations must create an outcome that is realistic, balanced, and fair; that meets the fundamental objectives of both sides; that reconciles their competing grievances; that strengthens the two parties rather than weakens one of them.

In coming here and accepting this challenge, Prime Minister Barak and Chairman Arafat have shown they are ready to take risks to pursue peace. They are visionary enough, courageous enough, and capable of building a fair, just, and lasting peace. I will be there with them, and I intend to do all I can to help.

America has a profound interest in a Middle East whose people are prosperous, at peace, and willing to confront common challenges as partners. For the same reasons, the rest of the world - and especially the rest of the region - cannot afford to be bystanders. For all those who are truly committed to the cause of peace and to the well-being of the Israeli and Palestinian people, now is the time to lend support to the peacemakers.
