LIFE IN WINTER

Painting by Mike Speiser

It may seem that life in the wild is on hold during the quiet hush of winter, but there's a lot going on! As temperatures drop, it's more important for all animals to conserve their energy. Finding food is the most important goal. Birds like cardinals and chickadees, which in summer seem to spend hours simply singing in a treetop, are much more business-like in winter, making regular rounds of food sites. Deer graze on leaves beneath the snow and munch small twigs from trees and bushes. Bears come out of their warm dens occasionally to find a snack. (Bears don't truly hibernate. They sleep soundly, but can be awakened and become aware rapidly.) Even the trees that seem so lifeless are full of activity – in winter, trees stop all activity in the cold air, and do all their growing in the root structure.
