The Five Big Political Myths About Nafta

By ALBERT R. HUNT

A senior House Democrat dismisses the consequences of a House rejection of the North American Free Trade Agreement next Wednesday: "In a few weeks it'll be forgotten." A Democratic senator, who opposes Nafta for political reasons and isn't particularly proud of it, sees a silver lining: "This will make health care easier."

These lawmakers should talk to Harry McPherson, a former top aide to President Johnson and a genuine Washington sage. A Nafta defeat, he fears, would be devastating for the country, the president and the Democratic Party. "The only question is how much of a calamity would it be?"

He's worried not so much about the particulars of this treaty, but about the

Politics & People

By Albert R. Hunt

signals it would send: "Internationally it would show that Clinton can't control his own party and make him look weak." Politically, he remembers when Lyndon Johnson taught him how once a president suffers a big setback, the political sharks smell blood and everything else is harder.

Yet if Nafta loses, a distinct possibility, it'll be the House Democrats who do it to themselves, largely due not only to substantive misinformation but to political myths that have overshadowed realities. The five big political myths are:

- Nafta isn't a presidential priority. Some Democrats still insist that Nafta isn't important for the Clinton presidency. He did get off to a late start. But in the past two months, he has given 16 speeches on Nafta and personally lobbied more than 100 House members, including seven private meals with undecided lawmakers. He knew he upped the stakes but believed a defeat would be so disastrous that he had no alternative. (Nafta would be dead on arrival if George Bush were president; imagine sending Dan Quayle to take on Ross Perot Tuesday night.)

A week from today, Bill Clinton heads to Seattle to meet leaders of the major Asian countries. The participants control 50% of the world's economy and, as the president acknowledged at yesterday's press conference, his ability to conduct economic negotiations would be "limited significantly" if he arrives the day after becoming the first U.S. president to lose a trade treaty. Mr. McPherson fears an even grimmer scenario: "Defeating Nafta increases the risks that GATT goes down and potentially sets the stage for a trade war of the kind we had in the '20s and '30s. This is extremely serious." Domestically, there also would be major consequences. "When a president gives everything he has and loses, it certainly hurts him on other issues," says the veteran president-watcher.

- A new Nafta would be better. In the Tuesday night debate with Vice President Al Gore, Ross Perot sounded the rallying cry of "Not this Nafta," but go back and negotiate a "good" treaty.

That ignores that there's a new Canadian government that will probably swallow this agreement but would be a huge hurdle to drafting a new treaty. Even more troubling, it's nonsense to think that just after being humiliated by the Yankee colossus the Mexicans would become more accommodating. Asked about a "new" Nafta, Jaime Serra Puche, the astute Mexican trade minister, says sure, "in about 50 years." That's an exaggeration, but it wouldn't happen during this Congress or this Clinton administration.

- An anti vote buys protection from labor. House Democrats, especially the 66 freshmen, fear that labor will retaliate if they vote for Nafta. This is a shrewd bluff on labor's part, but only inexperienced congressmen are falling for it. Next year's calendar includes a minimum wage increase, a striker replacement bill and health insurance, all issues as important to labor as Nafta. Unions certainly aren't going to write off essential votes on those issues or desert dozens of Democrats next fall so they can be replaced by conservative Republicans. Veteran lawmakers understand this; six-term Rep. Howard Berman of California, a Nafta supporter, had a Los Angeles fund-raiser two weeks ago and got almost $50,000 from labor.

A number of House Democrats honestly share labor's fears over this agreement and a smaller group reflects the private candor of one member who notes, "I'm with the Teamsters on this and I stay bought." For most of the rest, however, the worries are misplaced. Some unions may try to mount a symbolic primary challenge against one or two pro-Nafta Democrats, but labor is much too smart to force a litmus test on an issue in which the Democratic House speaker and Senate majority leader are on the wrong side.

- Protection will be bought from Perot. Fence-sitters worry about Ross Perot's threat to attack pro-Nafta lawmakers next year. But he'll also go after members who vote against a balanced budget amendment or any excuse he can find. "This is only the fight of the week for Perot," says Ed Rollins, the GOP strategist who briefly ran the Texas billionaire's campaign last year. "You're never OK with Perot; if it's in his interest, he'll shoot you between the eyes in a minute."

Harry McPherson

Nafta is merely a convenient vehicle for Mr. Perot to rally disaffected citizens, a political ego trip, which judging from his debate performance Tuesday may be wearing thin. But any Democrat, or Republican for that matter, who hopes to buy peace with the Texas billionaire is rolling the dice. Besides, he or she too might become a target of those pro-Nafta, Mafia-sponsored hit men from Cuba!

- The politics are a clear-cut loser. Nafta's opponents are far more intense than its proponents. That's why the Clinton administration is worried that its recent gains could be offset when members go home for a long Veterans Day recess this weekend.

But nervous Democrats may be so focused on the micropolitics that they are ignoring the larger political calculus. In last month's Wall Street Journal/NBC News survey, voters by a 2-to-1 margin said it's better if Congress and the presidency are controlled by different political parties. And by 72% to 22%, voters today believe that gridlock in Washington is as bad as ever, despite the fact that Democrats control both branches.

A Nafta defeat would only add to this anxiety, and the most appetizing target for frustrated voters would be incumbent Democrats. "A weakened president is very bad for House Democrats in terms of their political self-interest," argues John Sasso, a leading Democratic political consultant.

Conversely, Mr. McPherson notes, a Clinton victory "would be terrific for the country and for him. He would have shown that, despite his other problems, he really is a chief of state." In that vein, these two-dozen wavering House Democrats, who together could tip the balance in favor of Nafta, should remember the words of another young Democratic president three decades ago that a rising tide lifts all boats. That's true in politics as well as economics.
