CORRECTION-DATE: February 7, 2000, Monday

CORRECTION:

Because of a reporting error, a Page 3 story on Monday incorrectly described Hillary Rodham Clinton's role in the congressional investigation into the Watergate scandal. Clinton served as a lawyer on the staff of the House Judiciary Committee.) In the film, her mother remembers that as a child, Hillary "was able to play with the boys and earn their respect" - implying that she'll do the same in the male-dominated Senate. Dr. T. Berry Brazelton, the famous pediatrician, says on camera, "I don't endorse politicians . . . but I can honestly say Hillary Clinton is my hero." At the same time, in her speech, Clinton dismissed the notion - which some of Giuliani's fund-raising letters have alleged - that she is an old-fashioned liberal. "I'm a New Democrat," she stated, echoing her husband's appeals when he first ran for president. She cited her belief in balanced budgets, welfare reform, and more police on the streets. She never mentioned Giuliani directly, but she clearly had him in mind when she said, to much applause and laughter, that she would fight against "the divisive politics of revenge and retribution." She also spoke out against school vouchers, which Giuliani supports. Curiously, the two candidates disagree on very few issues - both support abortion rights, gay rights, and gun control - so they are likely to emphasize as dramatically as they can their areas of dispute. Polls released in the past few days show her trailing Giuliani statewide by 3 to 7 percentage points - a virtual tie, given the statistical margin of error. She is strongest in New York City, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 5 to 1, and among African-Americans, Hispanics, households with union members, and the poor. Giuliani is strongest in the suburbs and among white people - including, to the surprise of many Democrats, white women. This week, Clinton carries her campaign to the big upstate cities - Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, and Albany - which, many analysts believe, she must carry decisively in order to offset Giuliani's edge in the state's rural regions. Yesterday's speech was broadcast live on some New York television stations, and, according to her campaign spokesmen, was transmitted to about 600 families across the state that were hosting fund-raising events attended by 25,000 people. The race is likely to be one of the most heated - and expensive - in the country. Clinton has raised $8 million, Giuliani nearly $12 million.
