When Whitewater and Monica Lewinsky hog the headlines, new wallpaper for the Blue Room grows pale by comparison.

"It makes better stories to write about Mrs. Clinton as a purely political person, so I think the changes in the White House, for the first time, have gone wholly or largely unnoticed by the general public," said Carl Sferrazza Anthony, who has written five books about first families.

Rest assured, however, that it is highly unlikely today that any president will be denied a second term because of his supposedly effete decorative tastes, like Martin Van Buren, or hounded by political rivals who say he's wasting the taxpayers' money, like J. NEWs flash: The White House has been redecorated. You haven't heard? Six of the seven ceremonial rooms on the State Floor have been face-lifted, just in time for this week's life-and-drum celebration of the building's 200th birthday. But unlike the decorating contretemps that have plagued previous administrations — Nancy Reagan's pricey china, Jacqueline Kennedy's French decorator, Martin Van Buren's gaudy Parisian carpets — this time out, hardly anyone has noticed the changes.

Since Nov. 1, 1800, when John Adams moved into a half-finished White House, congressmen, curators and citizens have quarreled over the most appropriate décor for the building, the nation's most troversy, a $1.78 million renovation that began in 1993 — and that includes the refurbishment of the Blue and Red Rooms, the State Dining Room, the East Room, the Cross Hall and the Entrance Hall — has been largely ignored. When Whitewater and Monica Lewinsky hog the headlines, new wallpaper for the Blue Room grows pale by comparison.

"It makes better stories to write about Mrs. Clinton as a purely political person, so I think the changes in the White House, for the first time, have gone wholly or largely unnoticed by the general public," said Carl Stierman, a New York City-based decorator who has written five books about first families.

refurbish the rooms with furniture appropriate to the house circa 1817 — a vision not unlike Jacqueline Kennedy's.

In 1925 an advisory committee was formed, but before long another decorating tug of war arose over what period the house should reflect. The American Institute of Architects entered the fray. In her encyclopedic new book, "The White House" (Abbeville Press), Betty C. Monkman, the present curator of the White House, writes that the institute worried "that changes would be made to the McKim, Mead & White state rooms with their French furnishings and expressed its views to President Coolidge." No changes were made on the State Floor, where public receptions are held, until 1928.

After a gutting and reconstruction of the White House during the Truman administration, the redecoration was done with moderately priced reproductions from B. Altman's in New York.

BUT it was Jacqueline Kennedy who was responsible for the most famous refurbishment. Her extensive efforts to locate authentic antiques associated with the house and its history and to raise funds for them changed forever the way the house was viewed. It became a historical house, a museum to Federal style, but not without considerable uproar.

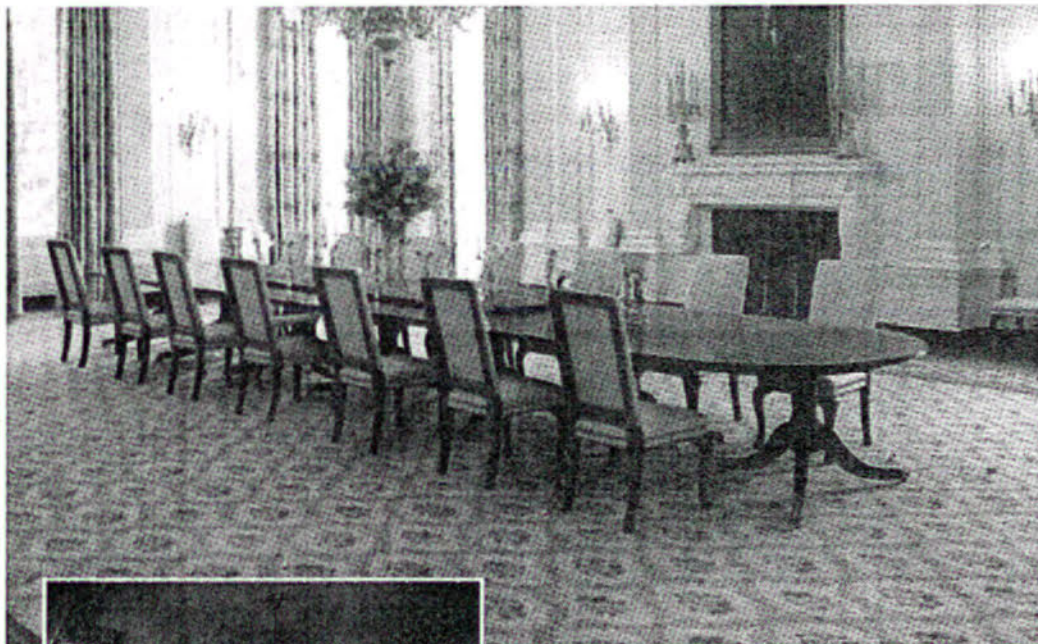

Mrs. Kennedy gathered together a formidable committee, with Henry Francis du Pont, founder of Winterthur, the museum of decorative arts near Wilmington, Del., as its chairman. Back then, it was determined that the Red, Blue and Green Rooms would reflect the best of American design between 1800 and 1825, though Teddy Roosevelt's Colonial Revival interiors were retained for the East Room and the State Dining Room.

The Kennedys also hired Sister Parish, the foremost American decorator of the time, only to use her as a beard for the real decorator, Stéphane Boudin, a Frenchman who specialized in sophisticated interiors for millionaires and royalty. For political reasons, Mrs. Kennedy tried to keep his presence under wraps, but Maxine Cheshire, the Washington Post columnist, ferreted out the secret.

Behind the scenes, Mr. Boudin and Mr. du Pont jockeyed for position as first adviser. James A. Abbott and Elaine M. Rice, writing in "Designing Camelot" (Van Nostrand Reinhold, 1998), say that William Voss Elder III, the registrar of the White House collection of furnishings, offered this crowning criticism: "Mr. Boudin may be all right as a decorator but he has absolutely no knowledge or respect for American furniture or paintings."

In the end, however, Mr. Boudin and his client prevailed. On Feb. 14, 1962, Mrs. Kennedy gave the country a television tour of the White House. Eighty million viewers didn't care who had decorated it. They loved it.

What was regal and luxurious in the 1960's has now been rethought and made more properly American. The differences are subtle but evident, as with the much stronger-looking silk-and-

WHO says she's not a New Yorker? Hillary Rodham Clinton has ordered a new set of White House china — at cost.

The 300 12-piece place settings from Lenox is the largest purchase of china ever made for the White House. The White House Historical Association, which wanted new china for the mansion's bicentennial, is footing the $240,000 bill. The size of the order reflects the Clintons' custom of "serving larger and larger dinners, all over the house," said Betty C. Monkman, the White House curator.

Choosing the pattern is one thing the first lady gets to do all by herself for the State Floor. And in a departure from recent tradition, she has replaced the presidential seal with an image of the White House. She selected cream-colored china with a wide pale-yellow border inside a narrow gold border, decorated with raised white architectural motifs, inspired by designs from the State Floor. Mrs. Clinton will introduce the china on Nov. 9 at the White House birthday dinner.

The historical association will pay for the china so that first ladies will never again have to beg their wealthy friends for money — or unleash the fury visited on Nancy Reagan after she spent $209,000 on a dinner service, for which taxpayers mistakenly believed they had paid. MARIAN BURROS were left, rather than risk stripping them. But the eagles on the McKim, Mead & White pier tables now gleam in the original mahogany. (Mr. Boudin had painted them white to blend in with the painted paneling.)

Even Mr. Bofferding, the New York furniture dealer, said that blithely painting historic elements today, for whatever reason, would be very difficult. "They were right to bring them back," he said, "and they look great to me."

Mr. Bofferding takes a dim view of the flowered curtains reproduced from a 1901 document, which he said sacrifice style for accuracy. But Russell Bush, a New York decorator, said approvingly, "The State Dining Room looks like Elsie de Wolfe working with Stanford White." De Wolfe, one of the most formidable decorators of the early 20th century and a famous White collaborator, "would have picked that carpet and those drapes," he said.

The most striking change in the East Room, which also retains its Colonial Revival architecture, was the undoing of yet another Boudin improvement: the marble-like paint work applied to the four red marble fireplaces and the marble baseboard trim, to make them less jarring against the pale walls. There was also a practical consideration: television cameras often nicked the paint on the fireplaces and the baseboards.

Some decorators bemoan the lack of contemporary furnishings and art in the White House, noting that great French modern designers like Andrée Putman and Philippe Starck have been leaving their mark on the Élysée Palace for decades. "I think it would be wonderful to do that," Mr. Bofferding said, at the same time confessing that "some of the furniture in the Élysée Palace is the worst I've ever seen."

Still, Mrs. Clinton has made a stab at addressing design movements of the 20th century. She was the first to add a painting by an American woman to the White House collection, an abstract landscape by Georgia O'Keeffe titled, "Bear Lake, New Mexico." (A de Kooning and a Kandinsky, both on loan, hang in the family quarters.)

With this sensitivity to the past instead of the present, it was no surprise that not everyone was thrilled when, in 1993, Mrs. Clinton accepted gifts of contemporary crafts and displayed them on the State Floor. "I thought they looked absolutely superb and worked extremely well," Mrs. Monkman, the White House curator, said of the collection of studio glass, woven baskets, wooden bowls and handmade silver. "Many people didn't think they were appropriate."

So what would happen if a future first lady — or first gentleman — wanted the White House to display more up-to-the-minute statements of American style? Like a cardboard chair by Frank Gehry? Or a sleek sofa by Donghia? Or Heaven forbid, an American icon like an Eames stool?

"We would do our darnedest to persuade her otherwise," Mr. Wilmerding said. "If we didn't, we'd probably resign."

ings he considered out of date. The last auction took place in 1903, when Theodore Roosevelt unloaded all the furniture, woodwork and stained glass installed in the 1880's by Chester Alan Arthur, whose selection of Louis Comfort Tiffany as redecorator was daringly modern — if inappropriate, in the eyes of later residents. (Tiffany was the Philippe Starck of his day.)

In the 1820's, John Quincy Adams was berated for using government funds to buy a billiard table. Yet, during an administration plagued by con-

And the changes carried out for the building's bicentennial say more about historical conformity than about cutting-edge pizzazz. "I know there is a nostalgia and romance to the Kennedy era," countered John Wilmerding, a professor of American art at Princeton and a member of the preservation committee. "But many on the committee felt the decoration under Kennedy was too French. We are adjusting it back to more American."

In the early days of the committee, experts were rarely consulted. "Before the Reagan administration, almost all the members were political appointees and didn't have any training in the decorative arts," Mr. Wilmerding said. "The depoliticizing of the committee was very good."

Though the committee seldom met during the Reagan administration — Clement Conger, then the White House curator, had been critical of the work done by Mrs. Reagan's decorator, Ted Graber — it was revitalized by Barbara Bush, who also supported the creation of the White House endowment with money from wealthy donors. It stands at $28 million today and provides funds for acquisitions and for redecorating the public rooms, which are in constant use for official functions. Though Congress is responsible for the upkeep of the house, it no longer controls the purse strings for redecoration, which can be useful for a president who doesn't share the political orientation of the Congressional majority. As honorary chairwoman of the Preservation Committee, Mrs. Clinton attended all nine meetings.

In contrast to the historically minded committee's desire for a more "American" White House, for the first 150 years the 132-room mansion was decorated in the style of the times — that is, it was modern, and reflective of contemporary trends and fads, many of them foreign. The stone structure designed by James Hoban in 1792 is Palladian, inspired by cutting-edge neo-Classical Irish houses of the day, while the interiors were more often than not reflective of what was hip in France, thanks to an especially Eurocentric president, James Monroe.

It was Monroe and his wife, Elizabeth, who installed the first important household furnishings: 54 pieces of carved and gilded French Empire furniture by Pierre-Antoine Bellangé, a Parisian cabinetmaker. Only eight pieces currently reside, thanks to James Buchanan's wholesale housecleaning of White House furnishings he considered out of date. The last auction took place in 1903, when Theodore Roosevelt unloaded all the furniture, woodwork and stained glass installed in the 1880's by Chester Alan Arthur, whose selection of Louis Comfort Tiffany as redecorator was daringly modern — if inappropriate, in the eyes of later residents. wool fabric that was installed this year in the Red Room, where Mr. Boudin had used a sophisticated but fragile cherry-red silk. Now, the color is "gutsy masculine American neo-Classical red, historically correct," said Robert Bitter, a co-owner of Scalmandre, which provided both fabrics. He distinguished between French Empire and the American interpretation of it. "High French style is more ornate," he said. "What we're seeing here is an American version of French Empire."

The fabric content is more useful, too, in rooms visited by more than a million tourists each year. As Mr. Wilmerding put it, "The guiding principles are, one, practical — simple conservation, protecting fabrics and material from wearing out — and then aesthetics."

The most extensive redecoration has taken place in the Blue Room. Mr. Boudin's choice of tone-on-tone cream silk wallcovering instead of blue — which made the room a gentler transition between the vivid Green and Red Rooms flanking it — has been replaced by tone-on-tone cream wallpaper peppered with medallions. "The medallions are much more appropriate to the period," said Richard Nylander, chief curator and director of collections for the Preservation of New England Antiquities in Boston and a preservation committee member.

As for the wallpaper border overhead, slides of wallpaper from 1815 to 1820 were borrowed from the Cooper-Hewitt National Design Museum in New York and projected on the walls to find the right sapphire blue. When the border arrived, however, the paper was a dark reddish brown above the swag design, mimicking a shadow, and it looked awkward. The committee took Mrs. Clinton's suggestion to cut out the brown part. The result is a trompe l'oeil touch that blends into the valances of the curtains. (Mr. Boudin had used actual silk swags, which were, like many of his touches, generally seen in European houses of the day, but not American ones.)

Not all the historical road maps were followed. In the State Dining Room, the Colonial Revival look of 1902 included oak-paneled walls and 11 big-game heads that Roosevelt had shot. "I think the women on the committee, including Mrs. Clinton, didn't like the idea of a macho look like a men's club in New York," Mr. Wilmerding said. "But the crucial fact is that the walls had been buried under lead paint. To remove such hazardous material would have meant closing the room for as much as two years.
