Mr. President:-

Recently I conceived an idea of making a "fish holder", a tool with which to grab fish when they are taken from the line. This tool holds the fish firmly while the hook is being removed and you can handle the fish without soiling your hands.

Sometime ago I made one of these tools for Mr. Lon Du Bois, whom I believe is president of the local Sports Club. Later I met him and asked him how it worked, he was very enthusiast about it, said he never had anything like it to handle fish. I suggested sending you a fish holder and he heartily agreed that you would appreciate it inasmuch as you are an ardent fisherman.

I am sending you by separate cover a small and a large fish holder which I trust you will initiate on your next fishing trip.

Very truly yours,

J. M. Fiori

BULLITT, Hon. William C.
Ambassador to France,
Paris, France
July 24, 1939
(filed 11-9-39)

Letter to the President saying that Mr. A. Conan, President of the French Union of War Blind, has just called him to inform him that he and the Secretary General of the same organization will visit the U.S. from Sept. 5th to Oct. 1st to discuss with various American foundations having to do with the care of the blind, certain technical questions concerning the blind. They would like to call on the President and present to him the original bronze maquette of the monument at Verdun. Ambassador Bullitt says that both Mr. Conan and the Secretary General of the organization are blind. Asks to be notified where the President expects to be about the 6th or 7th of September. In his reply of Aug. 7th, Gen. Watson advised that the President expects to alternate between Hyde Park and Washington "and if Mr. Conan will get in touch with me on his arrival, we will arrange a suitable time for him to see the President." - On Aug. 22nd, Ambassador Bullitt wrote to Gen. Watson thanking for his letter of Aug. 7th and explaining that he has already notified Mr. Conan to communicate with the General through the French Embassy in Washington when he arrives. - Attached is a photograph of the monument at Verdun.

Are Banks and Savings and Loan Associations in Competition?

By C. H. ELLINGSON

Executive Vice-President,
FIRST FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATION of Washington

This is a reprint of an article which appeared in the May, 1939, issue of the AMERICAN BUILDING ASSOCIATION NEWS. The article is premised on the belief that basically there is no real competition between Banks and Savings and Loan Associations, and is being reprinted in this form in the interest of a more harmonious understanding among these types of institutions.

RECENTLY when the Senate had under consideration a proposal to exclude the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and its auxiliary agencies from the provisions of the Reorganization Act, some of the Senators who spoke in support of the proposed amendment seemed to be of the belief that there is existent an unfriendly atmosphere between commercial banks and savings and loan associations (See Congressional Record, March 20, 1939)..

From personal experience, gathered through contacts with leaders in the industry over a period of many years, it is our observation that if any such condition does exist it is purely local in scope, confined to isolated sections of the country, and usually represents clashes in rival personalities rather than being occasioned by whatever economic competition may exist as between the two types of lending agencies.

The reasons for such a conclusion are not difficult to explain. Well informed commercial bankers usually recognize that savings and loan associations came into existence in America largely because people of moderate circumstances had no other medium through which funds might be obtained for the financing of homes. Another factor which is readily recognized is the fact that these thrift and home-financing institutions have held tenaciously to their particular field of activity, and have not, as a general rule, encroached into other phases of financing. Furthermore, our good banking friends recognize that the service extended by these home-financing institutions offers a most effective stimulus to the entire building industry, which, in turn, results in increased business not only for the commercial banks but for the entire business community.

Home building dependent on long term credit

The activity of home building is dependent to a considerable degree on the availability of long-time credit, the major portion of which has been and still is being furnished by the mutual type of savings and loan association. It is true, of course, that since the advent into the picture of the insurance plan of the Federal Housing Administration, commercial banks have been more active in the field of home financing than has been the case heretofore. It must be recognized, however, that even with the insurance of mortgage loans the amount of home financing which can be handled through the commercial banks of a community must, necessarily, be limited, and that there will always be a definite need for the savings and loan type of institution. In this connection, I feel certain that the commercial bankers will be the first to concede that the welfare of any community is better served when the homes of the community are financed, as far as possible, by local funds (either by banks, savings and loan associations, or private lenders) rather than to have such mortgages passed on to "outside creditors".

Intensity of Circulation Important

It is a truism in the field of finance that the economic health of a community is measured not so much by the amount of money that may be available for circulation, as by the intensity with which the money that is available is being circulated. For example—in a recent article in the AMERICAN BUILDING ASSOCIATION NEWS it was pointed out that by actual experimentation it had been found that a certain Dollar bill in a given community had passed through the hands of 219 persons before it returned to the bank. In other words, during the course of its circulation this single dollar had purchased $219.00 worth of merchandise, while the additional amount which it had earned for its various owners during this single period of circulation could only be conjectured.

The dollar that is invested in a savings and loan association is the busiest of all dollars in helping to build and increase the taxable wealth of a community and in stimulating every branch of its commercial life. It has been estimated that at least 36 different kinds of businesses profit, in one way or another, every time a new house is being built. It is difficult to appreciate the full extent to which all lines of local business are benefited as this money is paid out to carpenters, electricians, lumbermen, hardwaremen, furniture dealers, etc. Such funds, of course, almost immediately find their way back to the local commercial bank. Even the cash balance which a savings and loan association must have on hand with which to carry on its business is kept on deposit in a local banking institution.

A more well rounded service

Thus it will be seen that the savings and loan association, instead of being a competitor to other types of financial institutions, fills a very definite need and thereby extends to the community a more complete and well-rounded financial service. In other words, a savings and loan association is just another medium of local circulation that is of immeasurable assistance in stimulating the banking and commercial activities of the community as a whole.

It is an historical fact that the activities of savings and loan associations have had a most salutary effect on the general well being of our whole national financial structure. As is well known, the banking institutions whose liquidity was not affected by a disproportionately large item of long-term mortgage security in their portfolio were the banks that weathered our last depression with the least amount of difficulty.

It is of further significance that in localities where home-financing institutions flourished most successfully, the commercial banking institutions were the least weighed down with so-called "frozen credit"—the long-term form of home mortgage. As is well recognized, commercial banks are primarily short-term credit institutions, organized more specifically for the purpose of rendering a commercial banking service, and for that reason are required to maintain a highly liquid position. In this connection, it may well be observed that even the insured type of home-loan mortgage must be considered in the category of possible "frozen credit", as there is no definite assurance of how liquid this form of investment may prove to be in times of future financial distress. Savings and loan, and building and loan associations, of course, are not banks, but are especially organized and adapted for the handling of long-term home mortgage credit—their particular field of activity.

Each has a distinctive service

When viewed in the light of these various factors there is certainly sound logic for the conclusion that commercial banks and savings and loan associations each have a distinctive service to render, and that these two types of institutions are not competitors in the sense, nor to the extent, that one commercial bank, or one savings and loan association, is a competitor of its neighbor of the same type across the street. Conversely, there are the strongest of reasons in these days of uncertainty and possible world peril, for all financial institutions to recognize that they have a community of interest which behooves them to pull together for their mutual good as well as for the good of the nation and the local communities which they are seeking to serve.
