SO SWEET: Shoppers buy fresh apples from Ha Farms at the Downtown Santa Monica Farmers' Market on Saturday morning.

Winter's bounty at the Farmers' Market

BY TAYLOR VAN ARSDALE
Special to the Daily Press

DOWNTOWN There's a winter nip in the air. Southern California has endured one of the colder winters on record. But don't despair. Toss on a warm sweater and head to the Farmers' Market. This is the time of year when root vegetables, apples and nutrient filled mushrooms are harvested, and make their appearance. That "cold snap" packed panache into the parsnips, put a pungent taste in the truffles, and added an extra crispness to those Fuji apples you love so much. This is where you want to be to get the very best in seasonal produce.

"It's all about what's in season," explains Farmers' Market director Laura Avery. "Everything that comes to the Farmers' Market has to be grown in California. That's why you won't find cantaloupes even though you might be able to find them at Vons, because they're not in production in California."

Since 1981, when it first opened, the Wednesday Downtown Farmers' Market (on Arizona Avenue between Fourth and Second streets) has been bringing us the best in seasonal produce — Saturday's market debuted in 1991 to accommodate those working during the week — and is the only one run by the State Department of Food and Agriculture thereby ensuring strict guidelines.

WEISER FAMILY FARMS

For the very best root vegetables stop by Weiser Family Farms. Their colorful display of carrots is enticing. "In nature, yellow, red, white and purple carrots have been around longer than the orange ones. It was actually the Dutch who developed the orange carrot through cross-pollination because orange represented the color of the Dutch royal family. Red is really the most common," explains owner Alex Weiser.

Nantes (the orange carrots), Purple Haze, Yellowstone, White Satin and red varieties are $2.50 per pound and you can mix and match. For juicing Weiser recommends an assortment that way, "you get the anti-oxidants and nutrients from several blends."

Sid Weiser (Alex's father and a former chemistry teacher) opened their farm in 1977 when he decided to follow his dream of working off the land. The family started with fruit trees and after acquiring farmland in other locations

Cuts to elder care could cost state dollars, lives

SHAYA TAYEFE MOHAJER

GLENDALE The grooves in Jose Lanz's gold college ring have been worn smooth by time, just as age and illness have eroded the 71-year-old Cuban's mind and body.

Without supervision, he often forgets to swallow his food. He can't get out of his wheelchair unassisted, and on bad days he reels from drooling laughter to angry outbursts, lost in memories of fights long past.

His wife of nearly half a century is his primary caregiver, but she has relied on publicly funded adult day care during rough patches over the last eight years for help in his care. That benefit could come to an end if proposed budget cuts are carried out to help reverse the state's $28 billion deficit.

Marchers support Egypt uprising

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WESTWOOD Demonstrators gathered in Los Angeles to show solidarity with protestors in Egypt and demand the Egyptian president step down.

Several hundred people are marching Saturday outside the Federal Building in Westwood, waving signs and Egyptian flags and chanting in English and Arabic against President Hosni Mubarak.

The demonstration was organized via Facebook by a group of graduate students at nearby UCLA.

Demonstrator Ayman Mahfouz, a 36-year-old Eyptian-American, says marchers want to see Mubarak ousted and the formation of a new interim government that will change the constitution.

A police spokesman says the LA rally has been peaceful.

Street protests in Egypt against Mubarak's rule are now in their fifth day.

The charging challenge
Main Library
601 Santa Monica Blvd., 6:30 p.m. — 9 p.m.
How can condo and apartment dwellers charge their electric cars without a home garage? To answer the question, Santa Monica Nissan will present a free public panel about Electric Vehicle (EV) charging for multifamily housing residents. Only last month, in a historic transformation of the transportation industry, Nissan began to deliver the first mass-marketed EV, its all-electric LEAF. Homeowners who purchased or leased the cars are having chargers installed in their garages. But policies and practices for installing these high voltage chargers in multi-family dwellings are just now evolving nationwide. Panelists will include representatives from Southern California Edison, The City of Santa Monica Building and Safety Division, and Coulomb Technologies, an EV charging-infrastructure company. Admission to the panel is free and open to the public. No reservations are required. For more information, call (310) 403-1303.

Hopkins takes 'The Rite' to top of box office

JAKE COYLE
AP Entertainment Writer

NEW YORK The Anthony Hopkins horror film "The Rite" topped the box office on a weekend notable for the bump many Oscar-nominated films received, according to studio estimates Sunday.

The Warner Bros. flick earned $15 million from just under 3,000 theaters. The PG-13, "Exorcist"-influenced movie drew most of its audience from the older-than-25 demographic.

In its 10th week of release, the Weinstein Company's "The King's Speech" earned $11.1 million while adding nearly 900 screens.

Now with a cumulative box-office haul of $72.2 million, the story of King George VI's triumph over his stuttering affliction continues to build momentum as the Oscar favorite for best picture. It led with 12 Oscar nominations on Tuesday, and its director, Tom Hooper, won best director from the Directors Guild on Saturday.

Last week's top film, the Natalie Portman romantic comedy "No Strings Attached," from Paramount, slipped to second with $13.7 million.

The other debut this weekend, CBS Films' action film "The Mechanic," which stars Jason Statham and Ben Foster, took in $11.5 million, tied for third with Sony's updated superhero film "The Green Hornet."

Heavily marketed, "The Rite" sought a PG-13 rating less to attract younger audience members than "not to offend" older fans of the 73-year-old Hopkins, said Dan Fellman, head of distribution for Warner Bros.

Southern California man arrested with explosives at Michigan mosque

JEFF KAROUB
Associated Press

DETROIT A 63-year-old Southern California man who was traveling with explosives in his vehicle with the intention of blowing up one of the nation's largest mosques where mourners had gathered for a funeral was arrested in the Detroit suburb of Dearborn, Michigan authorities said Sunday.

Dearborn police said Roger Stockham was arraigned Wednesday on one count of making a false report or threat of terrorism and one count of possessing explosives with an unlawful intent. Stockham had a large but undisclosed quantity of class-C fireworks including M-80s, which are outlawed in Michigan, Chief Ronald Haddad said.

"I was comfortable with the fact that we had taken him off the street — he isn't going anywhere," Haddad told The Associated Press Sunday afternoon. "I think the society he wanted to impact is safe."

Haddad said Stockham was arrested Monday evening without incident in the parking lot of Islamic Center of America, while a large group was gathered inside. He said police received a 911 call from a resident.

Haddad said authorities believe Stockham was acting alone but still take him "very seriously." He said Stockham has "a long history of anti-government activities," though he declined to elaborate.

The chief said he called the mosque leader, Imam Hassan al-Qazwini, early Tuesday to let him know of the arrest, and later met with Qazwini and mosque board members. He said members shared concerns about copycat crimes if the arrest was publicized, and Haddad said he understood.

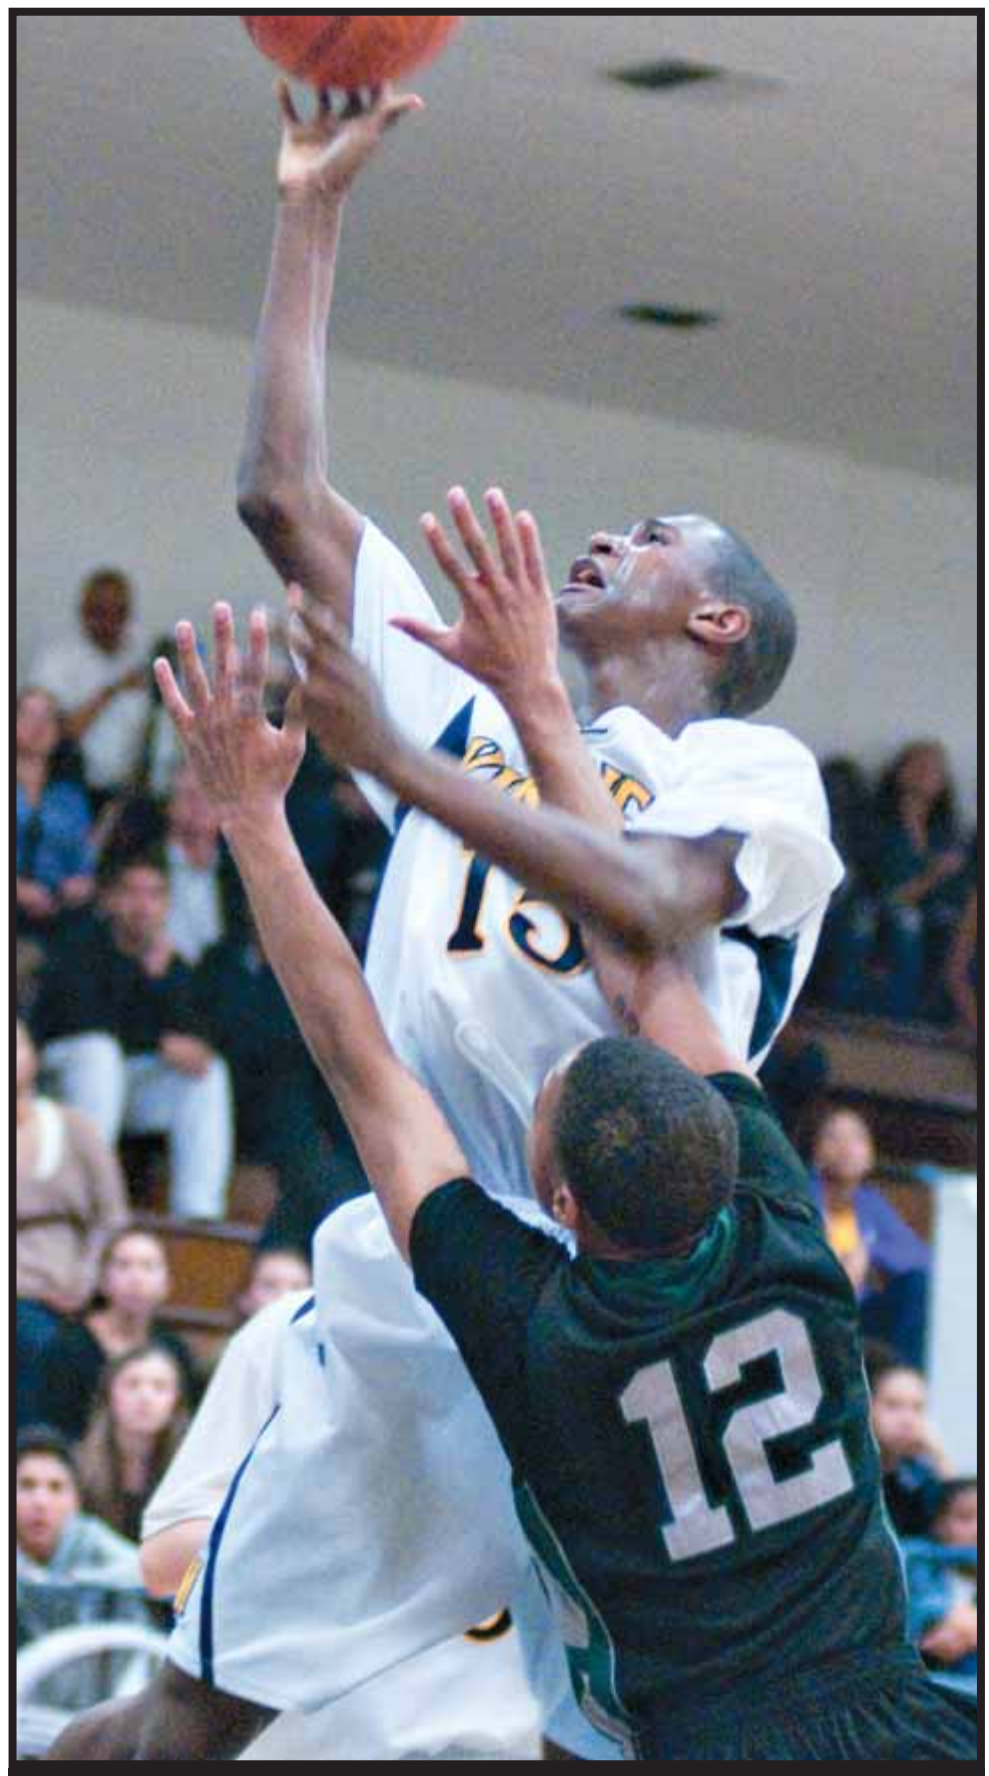

"We never want to put something out there that gives someone the 'how-to,'" Haddad said.

Qazwini informed worshippers about the incident during his sermon on Friday. The Council on American-Islamic Relations' Michigan chapter issued a news release Saturday night and the police followed Sunday morning.

Stockham remained jailed Sunday on a $500,000 bond. A preliminary examination is scheduled for Friday.

Police didn't know whether Stockham had an attorney. A public records search did not turn up a listed number for Stockham, though Haddad said he lives in Imperial Beach, near San Diego.

Dearborn, located about 10 miles west of Detroit, is the capital of the Detroit area's Arab-American community, which is one of the largest in the U.S.

Protecting the right to repair

Editor:

Members of the 112th Congress have an opportunity to take bipartisan action that would have a positive outcome for every American who owns and operates a car, truck, motorcycle or other motor vehicle. Passage of the Motor Vehicle Owners Right to Repair Act would ensure that vehicle owners have a choice of where they bring their vehicle for repairs, ensuring that vehicle repair is affordable and convenient for all Americans.

A wide variety of constituencies have come out in support of the Right to Repair Act including those representing the military and their families, senior citizens, motorcycle riders, recyclers and organizations representing consumers and rural communities. Consumers benefit from competition and groups like AAA, the American Military Society and National Grange know that their members are at a disadvantage when neighborhood auto repair shops are denied ready access to non-proprietary service information and tools needed to properly maintain today's highly sophisticated motor vehicles.

Enthusiastic grassroots support of Right to Repair continues to gain momentum, sending a strong message to Congress that motoring consumers want this issue heard and passed. Tens of thousands have sent emails and letters of support to their elected officials and thousands have joined the rapidly growing social media community to participate in the conversation and follow the legislative developments.

Please join us and take action by visiting www.righttorepair.org to send a letter to your members of Congress urging them to support the Right to Repair Act.

What are they afraid of?

THREE COUNCIL PERSONS WHO'VE accepted thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from developers dug in their heels on campaign finance disclosure again at Tuesday's City Council meeting.

Despite urging from leaders of most of the city's neighborhood groups and concerned citizens, Pam O'Connor, Terry O'Day and Mayor Richard Bloom voted against a motion to make printed campaign disclosure statements available to the public at council meetings.

The motion was put forth by Councilman Kevin McKeown. At the Jan. 17 council meeting, a similar McKeown proposal that council persons verbally disclose campaign donations from persons/entities doing business with City Hall when their items are before council for review was also defeated.

O'Connor, O'Day and Bloom made mealy-mouthed excuses why they wouldn't support having paper copies of campaign statements available during council sessions. Although City Clerk Maria Stewart (whose department is responsible for campaign filings) said that hard copies already existed in her office and could be moved to council chambers for meetings.

Because they were online and available at the City Clerk (only) during business hours, Bloom saw "no public benefit" to also having statements available during evening council sessions. But, what's the harm or better yet, what's Bloom afraid of?

O'Day fretted about what would happen if two people wanted to look at a statement at the same time. He asked how would we know if some statements went missing. He characterized having statements on hand as a "marginal benefit versus the cost."

Copying costs (if any) are negligible so O'Day's and Bloom's frugality is laughable — especially after asking staff to spend thousands of dollars in time looking into their suggestions for tweaking an interim ordinance on adoption of Land Use and Circulation Element (LUCE) standards for Downtown developments in the pipeline earlier in the meeting.

In the end, McKeown's motion failed five to two with McKeown and Gleam Davis (who opposed verbal disclosure on Jan. 17) supporting the proposal. Bobby Shriver and Bob Holbrook were absent.

This is not the end of this debate. With some council members stonewalling campaign disclosure efforts, its now up to neighborhood leaders to do their own research and hand out their findings — with comments connecting the dots — at all public meetings when items relating to campaign contributors are on the council agenda.

You can bet the family Prius that campaign donations will be a major issue in nest year's election when Bloom, O'Day and Davis must run to stay on the dais for four years although Bloom has indicated he may run for Assembly, instead.

'SKINS' NOTHING TO FEAR

I have to disagree with Daily Press Editor, Kevin Herrera's negative take on MTV's "Skins." ("The decline of decency," Jan. 28, Page 4).

I'm a big fan of the British series beginning its fifth season on Channel 4 in England. A butchered version of the UK "Skins" has run on BBC America, unfortunately with sanitized language and blurred nudity (which is considerable), nevertheless it's still powerful drama

I was curious to see what MTV would do with "Skins." The UK series is a lot more gritty and although very explicit, most of the teen's actions have serious consequences. The MTV version deals with controversial topics but often undercuts itself by lapsing into slapstick or overstretching credibility

MTV's first "Skins" episode was uneven but the second episode was much improved. In Episode two, The main plot deals with lover boy Tony (James Newman). He connects with Tea (Sofia Black-D'Lia), an avowed lesbian. They talk, hang out, swig vodka and go to her place where eventually they have sex — quick and unsatisfying.

This episode was not about sex but about power. With Tony, it's all about power: Tea's searching for her match and Tony's trying to "match" someone he didn't think he could control. It's really pretty strong stuff.

Despite the complaints about nudity, both actors were fully clothed during their "love" scene which was shot so ambiguously, I failed to realize they had "done the deed" until reading a recap of the episode the next morning.

The performances by Newman and Black-D'Lia were rich, multilayered and nuanced. The repercussions of their quick hook-up have yet to be revealed — Tony has a steady girlfriend. I'm hoping MTV's version follows this up. The UK series would.

In both series, the casts are excellent and I appreciate the fact that 17-year-olds are played by real teens not 27-year-olds. The scripts, in both series are co-developed by teens providing extra verisimilitude to the drama.

I also resent that the right-wing, evangelical Parents Television Council's attempt to censor "Skins" which it considers "child pornography." MTV and advertisers such as Subway and Taco Bell have been pressured to drop the show. The group recently labeled "Glee" "Unfit for young viewers" because its cast (in their 20s) posed for a slightly risqué GQ Magazine cover which the PTC claimed "bordered on pedophilia."

Brewer says cans better for planet

CLARKE CANFIELD
Associated Press

LEWISTON, Maine Canned beer isn't just for swilling anymore.

Baxter Brewing in Maine has joined a growing number of small craft-beer breweries distributing their brews in cans — just like mainstream mass-produced beers — rather than in bottles. A decade ago, it's believed there weren't any U.S. craft breweries canning their suds. Nowadays, nearly 100 sell at least one beer variety in metal.

Baxter Brewing founder and president Luke Livingston said cans are good for the beer, the environment and consumers, because they're easy to take to places like camping trips and golf outings. Still, cans in some quarters have to overcome the stereotype of chugging contests or a beer-bellied John Belushi crushing cans on his forehead in the 1978 movie "Animal House."

When Livingston decided to open a small brewery sans bottles, some people told him they would never stoop to drinking beer from a can — that bottles were way better, and draft beer was the best.

"My retort to those people is that draft beer comes out of a keg," Livingston said at his brewery, located inside a former textile mill in this central Maine city. "And what's a keg? A keg's just a big can, it's a big metal container."

As the craft beer industry took off in the 1990s, small local and regional breweries distributed their ales, bocks, stouts and other varieties in bottles.

Craft beers generally are made in small batches by small breweries and are typically more complex in taste than mainstream beers. U.S. craft-beer brewers sold 282 million gallons in 2009, accounting for 6.3 percent of U.S. beer sales by value, according to the Brewers Association, a Boulder, Colo.-based group representing craft brewers.

While craft beer has been sold predominantly in bottles, cans have been equated with mainstream beers such as Budweiser, Coors and Pabst Blue Ribbon.

The tiny Oskar Blues brew pub in Colorado broke that mold in 2002, when it began canning its Dale's Pale Ale beer by hand with a tabletop canning machine. Oskar Blues Brewery, which is widely credited with starting the craft beer-in-a-can trend, brewed about 18,600 gallons of canned beer that first year.

It was such a hit that the owner opened a brewery in 2008 with a high-speed canning line. Production this year is expected to reach 1.9 million gallons, with six different styles of beer.

Spokesman Chad Melis said Oskar Blues has tried to educate beer drinkers about the benefits of cans "one beer at a time."

"It's a little bit of an educational curve for people to get over the preconceived notion that cheap beer is in cans," Melis said.

Since 2002, other microbreweries have jumped on the bandwagon. Baxter Brewing is the latest, putting its Pamola Xtra Pale Ale and Stowaway IPA in cans.

A decade ago, it was hard for a microbrewery to can beer because canning equipment was geared toward mass producers, not small-scale breweries, said Julia Herz of the Brewers Association. And can companies required large orders of cans beyond the means of small-scale beer makers, she said.

But canning equipment has changed and small breweries can now order small batches of cans, she said. At the same time, craft beer drinkers aren't averse to the idea of cans the way they once were.

Cans improve quality, Livingston said, because the beer isn't tainted by light and is exposed to less oxygen than bottled varieties. They're also more conducive to bringing on canoe or camping trips, to the beach, on boats or on the golf course.

As for the environment, Livingston said, cans take less fuel to ship because they are lighter than bottles. Consumers, he added, are twice as likely to recycle cans as bottles.

Recently, Livingston and brewmaster Michael LaCharite examined their canning machine, capable of filling and seaming 30 cans a minute, the day before canning was to commence. Out back in a warehouse, 44 pallets were stacked with 342,000 empty cans ready to be filled.

The beer is bound for retail shelves across Maine the first week of February. Livingston projects sales of 70,000 cases — that's nearly 1.7 million cans — this year.

Livingston became aware of canned craft beer when he ran a beer blog. He also took note that most canned craft beer was out West and was relatively unheard of in the East.

"My marketing light bulb went off, and I said somebody's got to do that around here," he said.

Livingston wrote a business plan, raised $1.2 million from investors and loans and started what he says is the only brewery in the East to can all of its beer.

Nearly 100 craft beer breweries in 39 states now sell at least one style in a can, said Russ Phillips, of Northampton, Mass., who tracks the numbers on his website, CraftCans.com.

"The reputation that has been attributed to canned beers is slowly being knocked down," Phillips said. "People are getting OK with the idea of better beer in a can."

MAKING GOOD: The Obama administration's reinstatement of funding to the United Nations Population Fund helps the agency's efforts around the world to reduce poverty and to ensure that every pregnancy is wanted, every birth is safe, every young person is free of HIV/AIDS, and every girl and woman is treated with dignity and respect.

Pledge for people

Dear EarthTalk

Global population numbers continue to rise, as does the poverty, suffering and environmental degradation that goes with it. Has the U.S., under Obama, increased or at least restored its family planning aid to developing countries that was cut when the Bush Administration first took office?

T. Healy,

THE SHORT ANSWER IS YES. PRESIDENT Obama is much more interested in family planning around the world than his predecessor ever was. One of Obama's first acts upon assuming office in 2009 was the restoration of funding for the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA). George W. Bush had withheld some $244 million in aid to the UNFPA over the previous seven years. UNFPA works with developing countries around the world to "reduce poverty and to ensure that every pregnancy is wanted, every birth is safe, every young person is free of HIV/AIDS, and every girl and woman is treated with dignity and respect."

Reinstated U.S. funding will help the agency pursue its goals of universal access to reproductive health services, universal primary education and closing of the gender gap in education, reducing maternal and infant mortality, increasing life expectancy and decreasing HIV infection rates.

Along with restoring UNFPA funding, Obama also overturned the so-called "Global Gag Rule" that prohibited groups funded by the U.S. Agency in International Development (USAID) from using any government or non-government funds for "providing advice, counseling or information regarding abortion, or lobbying a foreign government to legalize or make abortion available." Foreign nonprofits were already not allowed to use U.S. funds to pay for abortions, but the Global Gag Rule — first instituted as the 'Mexico City Policy' in 1984 by the Reagan White House, then overturned by Clinton and later reinstated by George W. Bush — went further by restricting the free speech rights of government grantees and stifling public debate on the contentious topic. Foreign NGOs that accept U.S. funding still cannot perform abortions, but can discuss the options openly with the families they serve.

"For too long, international family planning assistance has been used as a political wedge issue, the subject of a back and forth debate that has served only to divide us," said Barack Obama upon overturning the policy as one of his first acts in office. "It is time that we end the politicization of this issue."

Of course, advocates for increased family planning are pressuring the Obama administration to step up its efforts aboard even more. The Institute of Medicine, one of four government-affiliated nonprofit "academies" of experts, recommended last spring that the U.S. increase its spending on global health by some 50 percent over the $63 billion pledged by the Obama White House over the next six years.

Groups providing family planning services domestically would also like to see the Obama administration step up funding for their programs, not only to improve the quality of life for American families but to save money and reduce abortions as well: A 2009 report by the nonprofit Guttmacher Institute concluded that publicly funded family planning services at both hospitals and non-profit clinics saves taxpayers $4 for every $1 spent by preventing nearly two million pregnancies and 810,000 abortions per year.

Daly City councilman seeks plastic grocery bag ban

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DALY CITY A city councilman wants to add this San Francisco suburb to the growing list of California communities that have banned plastic grocery bags. But an industry group is poised to add the city to its list of places where it is fighting to overturn such restrictions.

Councilman David Canepa told The San Francisco Examiner that he will propose an ordinance at the Feb. 14 council meeting. The measure would ban plastic bags at supermarkets and other retailers with stores larger than 10,000 square feet.

"Plastic bags have a detrimental effect on our parks, on the streets, at our storm water dispensers," Canepa said. "It's going directly into our waterways; it's going directly into the ocean."

Canepa's measure would allow paper bags made of more than 40 percent recycled content but would require retailers to charge a fee of at least 10 cents per bag.

San Francisco became the first city in the country to ban plastic bags at grocery stores and drug stores with an ordinance passed in 2007. Similar measures have since been passed in Palo Alto, Oakland, Fairfax, Malibu and Los Angeles County.

Supervisors in Marin County passed a ban on grocery bags earlier this month.

The Save the Plastic Bag Coalition, an industry group, has sued some cities and counties that it says did not perform complete environmental impact reviews.

Stephen Joseph, an attorney with the coalition, says the group would sue Daly City if it passed the ban without an environmental impact report.

The group has argued that an increase in paper bag use following a plastic bag ban could be environmentally damaging.

Some environmentalists who support plastic bag bans also say that paper bags are not an improvement.

Save the Bay spokeswoman Amy Ricard said her group prefers that consumers use reusable bags.

Elephant refuge starts anew after founder's firing

KRISTIN M. HALL
Associated Press

HOHENWALD, Tenn. Nestled on a secluded tract in the wooded hills of rural Tennessee is a sight that would likely startle an outsider, if outsiders were permitted to see it: the nation's largest sanctuary for old, sick and rescued elephants.

For the past 15 years, elephants who had spent lifetimes in zoos and circuses have found a place to retire, rest and roam, far from noisy audiences and free from cramped quarters.

Now, after an unexpected management change and a lawsuit filed by one of the original founders last year, their place of refuge is undergoing changes that may allow the world a better glimpse of their lives.

The sanctuary that's never been open to the public now wants to be a worldwide educational center for elephant care, while still remaining true to its mission to be a refuge for needy elephants.

"The sanctuary is and has always been about far more than just the people who work in it," said Rob Atkinson, the new CEO who arrived in Tennessee late last year. "It's about the elephants."

In 1995, two former elephant trainers, Carol Buckley and Scott Blais, started the sanctuary near Hohenwald, Tenn., about 85 miles southwest of Nashville, in part because Tennessee's temperate climate and vegetation made it a good home for African and Asian elephants.

With 2,700 acres of woodland with a 25-acre lake, the sanctuary has been home to 24 elephants since it opened, including several who were confiscated by authorities.

The sanctuary says zoos and circuses in the U.S. hold hundreds of captive elephants.

"There are so many elephants in really bad situations, if not terrible conditions," said Pat Derby, who runs the California-based Performing Animal Welfare Society. "They are intelligent, brilliant and they need to be somewhere where they can express their natural behaviors and have companions."

Buckley ran the place from the beginning, but later became at odds with the board of directors over money matters. She also said in a lawsuit that she was ordered by a board member to delay telling a state wildlife agency that one of the elephants tested positive for tuberculosis.

The board, many of whom have been with the sanctuary for years, says that it negotiated with Buckley in hopes she would remain with the sanctuary in another position, but that she wouldn't cooperate. She was fired in March and filed a lawsuit seeking $500,000 in damages and visitation rights to see one of the elephants.

Buckley, who has since founded a new organization called Elephant Aid International, did not respond to e-mail and phone requests for comment. Last year, the board found a new CEO to work with co-founder Blais, who remains in charge of elephant care and facilities. Blais declined to be interviewed by the AP regarding Buckley or the lawsuit.

The new director studied at Oxford University and spent the past 11 years with the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. There he worked on an eight-year campaign that led to a 25 percent reduction in the number of elephants kept in zoos in the United Kingdom.

Atkinson said he hasn't been involved with the lawsuit, nor is he worried that Buckley's firing will hurt support for the sanctuary. But he's still trying to allay fears that he intends to bring drastic change.

"I'm sure there's some worry that when a new person comes in they are going to try to change it or do something awful, but I tried to make it very clear from the moment I applied for the job that the mission is sacrosanct," Atkinson said.

While the sanctuary will remain closed to the public, a new educational gallery is open in Hohenwald's downtown square, where people can meet with the caregivers and learn about the elephants. More than 12 new video cameras have been added throughout the grounds, which can be streamed live online or used in distance learning programs.

Sedatives used to free whale from fishing line

RAY HENRY
Associated Press

ATLANTA Researchers have a new tactic to save endangered whales tangled in fishing line: Get them to calm down with sedatives shot from a dart gun so they can pull closer and cut the potentially fatal gear away.

The method was used Jan. 15 off the Florida coast to free a young North Atlantic right whale from about 50 feet of line wrapped through its mouth and around its flippers. A satellite monitor attached to the whale during the rescue attempt this month shows it survived.

"It's a big step for us," said Michael Moore, a senior research specialist at the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution in Massachusetts who was on the rescue team. The same team has tried the technique during one other rescue of a free-swimming whale.

Wildlife authorities for years have tried different ways to save whales tangled in gear that cuts their flesh, restricts feeding and causes infection and starvation.

It's a major threat to the 300 to 400 critically endangered North Atlantic right whales that remain. They generally migrate seasonally from the Lower Bay of Fundy in Canada during the summer to calving grounds off the Florida coast in the fall and winter.

At least two North Atlantic right whales are known to have died from entanglement between 2005 to 2009, although 28 were observed tangled in that same period. Experts say those numbers only include dead or tangled whales that have been spotted, meaning other whales may die unseen.

"It's a very slow, painful death," said Michael Walsh, associate director of the Aquatic Animal Health Program at the University of Florida. The former SeaWorld veterinarian helped develop the sedative mixture.

Once tangled whales are found, rescue teams generally tie boats and buoys to lines trailing from the animal to slow it down and restrict its movement. Crews then use pole-mounted knives to cut off entangling gear.

The techniques are imperfect. Staying behind a whale is safe for humans, but it's difficult to reach gear wrapped around the front of the animal. Success rates, which vary by species and tangle, are low for right whales, especially those with lines caught around their flippers and jaws. When boats get close, right whales tend to flee or dive underwater.

"They're likely in a lot of discomfort," said Jamison Smith, who oversees the freeing of large, tangled whales in the Atlantic for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. "They don't want to be ... harassed by a small boat."

Bison in pilot program shipped back to Yellowstone Park

MATTHEW BROWN
Associated Press

BILLINGS, Mont. A group of wild bison was returned to Yellowstone National Park on Friday in a setback to a fledgling program that allowed the animals into parts of Montana where bison had long been prohibited.

The roundup of the 13 animals came after they repeatedly left a 2,500-acre grazing area in the Gallatin National Forest, crossing the Yellowstone River and entering private property.

After their capture, the animals were trucked just outside Yellowstone's northern border and released. Observers said the bison immediately moved back into the park.

At least 10 bison remain on the Gallatin. One bison is at large and another was shot Monday by state livestock agents after efforts to haze it back onto public property failed.

Bison have been barred for decades from leaving Yellowstone over fears they will transmit the disease brucellosis to cattle. But 25 were allowed to leave the park last week under a pilot initiative costing more than $3 million and highly touted by officials including Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer.

Montana Department of Livestock spokesman Steve Merritt said the decision to move most of the bison back toward the park was made in conjunction with Montana Fish, Wildlife and Parks, the National Park Service and the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

"We've given up on those 13," he said.

Some bison advocates and area landowners had questioned the wisdom of moving the animals onto the Gallatin forest, saying the bison would not stay in place and the program would fail.

"It was flawed from the start," said Glenn Hockett with the Bozeman-based Gallatin Wildlife Association. "It was politically driven so Schweitzer could say, 'I saved the bison.' But the bison aren't playing."

An aide to Schweitzer denied any political pressures and noted that plans to let the bison onto the Gallatin predated the governor's election. Mike Volesky, Schweitzer's natural resources adviser, added that the 10 bison still on the forest land suggest the initiative could yet prove viable.

"They're going to see what works and learn from it," Volesky said.

He added that the $3 million spent on the effort also had resulted in cattle being removed from the Royal Teton Ranch, just outside the park's boundary. The ranch was previously considered a potential risk for a brucellosis infection in cattle.

Yellowstone has an estimated 3,900 bison — one of the largest concentrations of the species in the world. The park's animals are considered genetically pure, versus bison in many other parts of the country that have interbred with cattle.

Officials are considering whether to replace the 13 bison by driving another group of animals out of Yellowstone, through a private ranch and onto the forest land. But Merritt said no decision had been made.

It also is possible that the 10 bison still on the Gallatin could be returned to the park, depending on their behavior. So far, however, those bison appear to have stayed within the grazing area known as Cutler Meadow.

As for expanding the area where bison can roam — a solution promoted by some bison advocates and sporting groups — Merritt said that was unlikely.

"We're trying it in one place, and it's not working out quite as we hoped for," he said. "I would think we would want to get situations like that ironed out before looking at" additional habitat outside the park.

abled seniors on Medi-Cal who use adult day health care centers every month, on average. Without funding, the centers are expected to close, meaning that families would have to shoulder the burden of caring for their sick alone or put them in a nursing home, where their care would be more expensive for the state.

According to the National Conference of State Legislatures, in a median year adult day health care services cost $15,600 while a semi-private room in a nursing room costs $67,525.

Like 95 percent of the other seniors at Glendale Gardens, Lanz is dependent on Medi-Cal, the state's health insurance program for the poor, to pay for the care because he's deemed medically fragile. Centers like Glendale Gardens provide transportation to and from a facility staffed with medical professionals who help rehabilitate stroke victims, monitor medications for the senile and care for the incontinent.

"Our people come here because they have multiple serious issues, they are people who cannot manage and treat their conditions on their own," said Armine Oroudjian, a registered nurse and owner of Glendale Gardens, which cares for 75 to 80 seniors a day.

The state program for adult day health care centers is a boon to families, allowing them to leave their loved ones in the care of medical professionals while taking much-needed respite to run errands or go to work.

Lanz' wife of 46 years, Vilma, says she's grateful for the help in dealing with his Alzheimer's disease, Parkinson's disease, diabetes, high blood pressure, incontinence and emotional mood swings, if only to have some time to buy groceries or clean the house.

Caring for her husband and keeping his spirits up is a full time job, she said.

"I bathe him, I dress him, I cook for him, I check his sugar, I give him his medicine and we watch soap operas," she said through a translator. "It's difficult but it's been 22 years, I'm used to it and I'm a woman of my house. This is my life."

The $419 million cost of California's program in fiscal year 2010 was split evenly between state funds and federal matching dollars.

Cuts to care for the vulnerable in Gov. Jerry Brown's proposed budget don't end there. The state wants to reduce in-home support services for 440,000 low-income seniors and disabled people, to save $500 million.

The state also is proposing to cap Medi-Cal benefits, such as hearing aids, medical equipment and doctors' visits. Medi-Cal recipients would be limited to 10 doctors' visits a year, with a $5 office visit co-pay and a $50 emergency room co-pay.

The state's director of health care services Toby Douglas said the day care program allows seniors to remain in their communities, but it is optional under Medicaid — known as Medi-Cal in California — and only eight other states pay for the benefit.

"Within the context of the fiscal crisis we're proposing to eliminate a valuable program," said Douglas.

In a state Senate hearing last week on cuts to adult day health care and other programs, Sens. Mark De Saulnier, D-Concord, and Elaine Alquist, D-Santa Clara, voiced support for the program but said they are forced to consider cuts because of serious budget problems.

"As a senior, I'm 66 years old now, and in taking care of my late, great husband Al Alquist I administered the medications and gave the showers, I understand what it's really like," said Alquist, urging advocates and local officials to help find budget solutions. "There is no long term savings by eliminating (adult day health care), there will be additional costs down the line. There will be great costs."

Cuts to the program were proposed twice before by former Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, but the budget has gone mostly unscathed over the past three years because the Legislature rejected the cuts.

Opponents call cuts short-sighted because their patient conditions will only deteriorate and treatment will become more expensive if they're neglected.

Last year, a study on behalf of the Congress of California Seniors found that it would cost the state more money to get rid of the program than to keep it, with $51 million in losses in the first year of implementation, and $72 million in the second. The cut would also result in the loss of 7,600 jobs, according to the study by the Lewin Group, a Virginia-based health consulting firm

Douglas' office said they had not reviewed the study, adding that it's difficult to project the outcomes the study found.

The cut would force closure of most, if not all, of the state's 309 adult day health care centers, which are deeply reliant on Medi-Cal funds, said Lydia Missaelides executive director of the trade group California Association for Adult Day Services.

"These seniors are already on Medi-Cal, they have complex medical situations and need skilled nursing and intervention or else their conditions can deteriorate," said Missaelides.

Center owners say they plan to sue the state for allegedly violating federal disability rights if the cut goes through.

"We're so small they feel they can touch this and no one will say anything. We're going to defend ourselves legally because these people deserve it," said Berdj Karapetian, owner of Victory Adult Day Health Care in Glendale.

Like a revolving door, the program ushers out those who are well enough to leave it and re-enrolls those whose conditions decline by checking to make sure participants medically require the care. The centers provide patient progress reports to the state every three months.

The hardest hit county would be Los Angeles, where the benefit was used 34,246 times in fiscal 2009. That's nearly 10 times the second-highest number of uses, at 3,472 in San Diego County. In all, the program's benefits were used more than 53,000 times by programs in 31 counties.

The program is not paid for by private insurance or Medicare, and few families pay for it out of pocket.

At Glendale Gardens, Sourob Megerdichian Sengerdi wears a navy suit jacket and a far-off smile on his face.

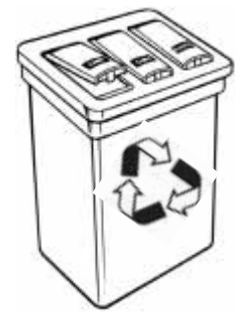

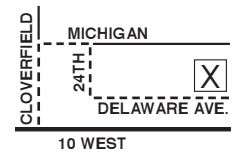

Born half-blind in Iran where he was raised by his Armenian family, he took on a line of work that only required him to have one eye open: photographer.

"Weddings, parties, birthdays — I would go to all kinds of parties, take pictures and have a lovely time, so much happiness and joy," he said in Farsi.

His son Vigen, 50, says that his father was the life of the party until he lost his only good eye two years ago. He has also struggled with his blood pressure, diabetes and weakness in his limbs that has made him clumsy at times.

When he crosses a room at the adult day health care facility, a young nurse guides him in a gentle hug, whispering directions in his ear in Armenian as he takes shuffling half-steps.

"I couldn't leave him alone," said Vigen. "I have peace of mind that he is here and I can go to work."

they branched out into vegetables. Located in the Lucern Valley, the sustainable Weiser Farms is fortunate to be privy to three unique growing climates; spring, fall and winter — this enables them to provide a large variety of vegetables.

They've become known for their most unique blend of fingerling potatoes; Rose Finn Apple, Red Thumb, French, Banana and Ozette — all seasonal priced at $2.50 a pound. Parsnips are also $2.50 per pound. "They are not as popular in the United States but they're great for soups and stews," says Weiser. Nearby are red, orange and Candy Stripe beets — which when cut in a cross section display richly hued, white and magenta rings. These go for $1.50 loose or $2 per bunch.

The piéce de resistance however is the Romanesco cauliflower. This fractal food — a complex shaped organism where each cell is a replica of the other — and which looks like something out of a sci-fi flick — is also one of the most stunning. It takes approximately three months to grow and costs $5.50 per pound. It's excellent served raw as it's crunchier than cauliflower and is also more savory.

Their produce is also available at Whole Foods.

For more info, visit www.weiserfamilyfarms.com.

HA FARMS

Specializing in seasonal fruit, Ha Farms, which opened in 1985 and is owned and operated by David Ha, displays a mouthwatering array of apples. According to the on-site manager, Choon Kim, "We try to make everything as natural as possible and use minimal processing."

Their apples are the crispest in the market.

"Apples need both snow to hit the trees as well as the heat of the summer for optimal growth. When the apple has to resist the natural temperatures that move from severe cold to severe heat it tends to grow more flavorful and firmer. If you grow the same exact Fuji apple at 70 degrees all year round it will be a softer, less flavorful apple because it didn't have to endure the extreme season. Because we have four seasons in Tehachapi, our apples tend to be sweeter and crispier." explains Kim. Which is why you can buy the exact same Fuji from different parts of California and they will all taste differently.

Seasonal delights include Cameo or Fuji Apples at $3 per pound and Red, Golden and Gala Apples at $1.75 per pound.

For a sensational taste treat you must try the apple fruit rolls. "Everything has an apple base because it gives the fruit roll a thickness and sweetness," says Kim. The fruit roll flavors are: apple/pear, apple/cinnamon, apple/peach, apple/jalepeño, apple/raspberry and apple/strawberry depending on what's in season, and nothing has any added sugar. Sublimely sweet, these sugar-free confections melt in your mouth. Another must try is the walnut and fruit brittle. Made with walnuts and seasonal Fuji apples this is another super-sweet item that surprisingly has no sugar.

Ha also sells bags of dried apples, pears and peaches.

"We decided not to put any sugar on our dried Fujis because they are so sweet," says Kim.

They offer two types of dried apples; plain and cinnamon — which tastes similar to apple pie. Cinnamon promotes blood circulation and is a great item for diabetics or those of us who are simply trying to avoid added sugar. The dried fruit comes in two sizes: $3 and $10 bags.

DAVID WEST'S FINE PALATE FOODS

If it's fungi you seek, you'll be wanting to head to this affable vendor. West, who hails from Brooklyn and got into the mushroom business by accident, knows much about his product.

"Hedgehogs, which are in season now, grow around the base of pine trees, which is why they have a spicy bite," West says.

And bite is the word, since these mushrooms have "teeth" instead of gills. These tooth-like projections are what inspired their name. When cooked they are a bit chewier than some of the other varieties and has the sweet and nutty flavor of a mild Chanterelle. The Hedgehogs, the Yellowfoot (a type of Hedghog) and Black Trumpets (which have no gills) are the delights of the season and are available until March.

The Hedgehogs go for $20 a pound. West also sells the delectable and coveted Black Truffle, which can be added to scrambled eggs, risotto and pates. These are $20 per ounce.

He also has Maitakes.

"These are cultivated and grown on oak which gives the mushroom a rich, meaty flavor," explains West.

They are $14 per pound and $28 per pound. Baby Shitake's go for $7 per pound.

Ivy League case tests Rockefeller drug law change

JENNIFER PELTZ
Associated Press

NEW YORK They were students who juggled an elite education with criminal extracurriculars, dealing an array of drugs from Ivy League dorm rooms and frat houses, prosecutors say.

But beneath the surface of academic success, some of the Columbia University students charged in a campus drug takedown struggled with substance abuse, their lawyers say. Attorneys for two of the five students plan to ask a court to prescribe treatment instead of prison — one of the most high-profile tests so far of a recent overhaul of New York's once-notoriously stringent drug laws.

The outcome will be watched closely by opponents and proponents of 2009 changes to mitigate what were known as the Rockefeller drug laws. Backers called the lesser punishments a more effective and humane approach to drug crime; critics said they gave drug peddlers a pass.

With the bid for what's known as "diversion" to treatment, the Columbia bust "is probably the case that's going to cause light to be shed on what these new laws mean: When diversion is appropriate, and what the Legislature intended when it cut back so drastically the Rockefeller laws," said Marc Agnifilo, who represents one of the students, Christopher Coles.

Coles and fellow students Harrison David, Adam Klein, Jose Perez and Michael Wymbs were arrested in December, have pleaded not guilty and are due back in court in March. Authorities called the arrests one of the largest drug takedowns at a New York City college in recent memory, and the prestigious setting made the case a media magnet.

Each student made some of the 31 sales in which an undercover officer bought about $11,000 worth of marijuana, cocaine, LSD, Ecstasy and prescription stimulants over five months, authorities said. Drugs, paraphernalia and more than $6,600 in cash were found in the students' rooms, according to the office of special narcotics prosecutor Bridget Brennan.

Prosecutors have indicated they're likely to add to the charges, but at least for now, only David faces mandatory prison time if convicted.

In 1973, Nelson Rockefeller, governor at the time, pushed strict laws through the Legislature that he said were needed to fight a drug-related "reign of terror." Critics long complained the laws were draconian and racist and filled prisons with people who needed treatment, not incarceration.

The 2009 revisions took away some mandatory minimum terms — after the harshest terms were eliminated in 2004 — and let hundreds of nonviolent drug offenders seek to shorten their sentences. The latest changes also gave judges more latitude to send nonviolent offenders to treatment programs or other alternatives to prison, on the premise that addressing addictions would do more to change some offenders' criminal behavior than would locking them up.

Coles and Wymbs hope a judge will use that discretion to channel their cases to a special drug court, their lawyers said. Drug court defendants generally undergo a year or more of treatment and may end up with their charges dismissed or reduced to misdemeanors.

To their lawyers, Coles and Wymbs are ideal candidates to illustrate the drug law reform's rehabilitation-minded message.

Coles, 20, is charged with selling marijuana and pairing in some amphetamine sales with Perez. An anthropology and political science major involved in a campus effort to combat sexual violence, Coles told police he sold drugs to pay tuition, prosecutors said.

But Coles' lawyer said the student was in the throes of a roughly $70-a-day marijuana habit. It had become so problematic that his father had called Columbia to express concern, Agnifilo said; a university spokesman declined to comment.

Wymbs, charged with selling LSD and Ecstasy, also has "a demonstrable problem with some substances," said his lawyer, Michael Bachner, declining to be more specific. A senior applied-mathematics major, Wymbs, 22, worked as a biostatistician for a cancer-research program last summer and plans to apply to graduate school, his lawyer said.

"At the end of the day, Michael Wymbs is better off among us, working to help society, than being labeled as a felon and being ostracized," Bachner said.

Prosecutors declined to comment on the students' request. A judge has yet to weigh it.

By law, their bid for treatment depends on showing that drug dependency drove their alleged crimes. But their circumstances also raise delicate questions about how to weigh issues of privilege and promise.

While their backgrounds and plans might augur well for their success in treatment, "are we to then look at those who are less privileged in our society and may have more difficulties, and punish them more harshly, when (the students') options were clearly more extensive?" said state Rep. Jeffrion Aubry, a Queens Democrat who was a key backer of the drug law changes. "It's a complex issue."

The move toward sending more offenders to treatment was a fraught part of the drug-law debate, with opposing sides disputing whether it would provide people opportunities to change their lives or give opportunists an easy way out. One critic of the 2009 changes said he wasn't sure they were meant to mitigate punishments for defendants like the Columbia students.

"I think you really have to take a close look at this, and is this really what we meant by a second chance?" said state Sen. Martin Golden, a Brooklyn Republican.

Leaders' power struggle roils Tulsa

JUSTIN JUOZAPAVICIUS
Associated Press

TULSA, Okla. Tulsa was built by oil barons in the early 1900s, and their stone, columned mansions still adorn the old historic districts. Lately, the city's image has been less ostentatious — as a middle-American family town, with a modest cost of living, comfortable neighborhoods spread across a rolling landscape, and a regular place on the most-livable-cities lists.

But the city's normally placid civic life has fallen into turmoil. At City Hall, where council meetings once played out in quiet tones, the mayor and council members have been accusing each other of ethics violations and slapping each other with lawsuits. The police have been in court — but as defendants rather than witnesses. Veteran officers have been indicted for felonies and the department is enduring its worst corruption scandal in recent history.

The chaos has clouded the city's effort to pull off a major urban revitalization, already lagging well behind other cities in the region.

Residents of Tulsa, who have long considered the one-time "Oil Capital of the World" a cut above its neighbors, seem confused and alarmed at the new state of affairs.

"I've never seen anything like this, and I've been here a long time," said City Councilman Roscoe Turner, 78.

University of Tulsa faculty member Cornell Cross worries that the troubles are more than a rough patch.

"There is just something wrong with Tulsa," said the chemistry instructor, who moved to the city six years ago. "When there's this much strife going on in the City Council, where the mayor and the council just can't seem to get along, as a businessman, do you really want to bet your fortunes on Tulsa?"

The problems have opened wounds from the past. Most of the abuses in the police scandal occurred in the black community, which experienced one of the nation's worst race riots 90 years ago and is still plagued by blight and violence.

"It just breaks my heart," said author Eddie Faye Gates, who has written about Tulsa's African American population, which accounts for 15 percent of the city's 390,000 residents. The rogue cops "need the book thrown at them," she said.

Life in Tulsa seemed charmed for generations. With the discovery of oil near the city in 1901, Tulsa grew fast and wealthy in its early years. Oilmen and business tycoons spent lavishly on culture, and the city became home to two renowned art museums and treasures of art deco architecture. But by the 1980s, the oil business was in decline and major oil companies began moving to Houston, leaving the downtown increasingly empty. Several attempts at revitalization flopped. Meanwhile, Oklahoma City and Little Rock, neither as affluent, pulled off major rehabilitations.

Tulsa recently added a glitzy multipurpose arena and a minor league ballpark to the center city, and nighttime entertainment is flickering to life in an old industrial section pocked with empty lots. But the real fireworks have been at city hall.

The city council and Mayor Dewey Bartlett, an oilman and son of a former governor who took office in 2009, have been locked in a power struggle, each accusing the other of exceeding their legal authority on an assortment of city business. Investigations and lawsuits have ensued.

"We don't get any respect," complained Turner, who has served on the council for 11 years. "They ignore us until it's time to take a vote on something."

Some local leaders say the police abuses show a community that hasn't addressed its problems. In neighborhoods where drug deals and shootings are common, officers allegedly planted drugs on suspects, stole money and fabricated evidence.

"It's a no-lose proposition for them, until someone starts cracking a little bit," Mark Lyons, a former Tulsa prosecutor, said of rogue cops patrolling the north side. So far, five former and current officers have been indicted and the probe continues. Dozens of criminal convictions had to be tossed out or sentences reduced.

The city's budget crisis is so dire that it recently accepted a lawyer's donation of $1.2 million in legal services to help defend several lawsuits filed over the abuses.

Mick Cornett, mayor of Oklahoma City, where a revived downtown buzzes with nightlife and a new NBA team plays, said upgrading a city can strain political cooperation.

"It's always important that the elected official and the business community put the city's interest first ahead of your own elected position," he said. "The city has to come first."

Bartlett acknowledged times have been "rocky." However, he said the city will push ahead with improvements and update the city's comprehensive plan for the first time in 30 years.

"We really are at just the beginning phase of what I think will be a serious renaissance of the city of Tulsa," Bartlett said.

Heal the Bay's Beach Report Card® is based on weekly water quality monitoring data provided by the City of Los Angeles' Environmental Monitoring Division and the Los Angeles County Department of Health Services. Data is analyzed as soon as it is made available to us by the public agencies. Beaches are graded on an A–F scale based on the risk of ocean users becoming ill. Samples are analyzed for bacteria—enterococcus, total and fecal coliforms—that indicate biological pollution. A fact sheet detailing the exact methodology used in determining grades for each location is available from the office or on our web site. The report is not designed to measure the amount of trash or toxins found at local beaches.

The Beach Report Card is an indication of past water quality and is not a warranty of the current safety of those areas surveyed. Our lawyers are happy.

ARIES (March 21-April 19)
★★★★★ Take a strong hand in an immediate situation. Perhaps a little less responsibility would make you happier, freeing up time for key priorities. Others could react strangely, as they are tired. Tonight: Head home ASAP.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20)
★★★★★ New information could toss your life into chaos. You also might discover that you are burdened by everything that you have to do at this point. Prioritize and delegate. Be happy about an opportunity. Tonight: Read between the lines with a friend.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20)
★★★★ Work closely with a partner in order to get results. Your ability to negotiate comes out. Consider whether this partner's interests are the same as yours. Postpone plans with a friend or loved one in order to accomplish what you must. Tonight: Discussions seem to go on forever.

CANCER (June 21-July 22)
★★★★★ Your ability to read key people in your life needs to come forward. You could be tired and feel as if someone is dragging you down. Sorting through what is happening with a key set of friends or associates could be important. Tonight: Let someone else decide!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22)
★★★ Maintain a steady pace. You could be a bit out of sorts. You'll get a lot done, quite quickly, if you focus on work, not people -- just for this moment in time! Prioritize your work and take breaks in order to recharge your energy. Tonight: Stop at the gym.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22)
★★★★ Remain sensitive to your limits. Are they self-imposed? Are they realistic? If you know the answers to these questions, when a risk moseys along today, you will know which way to go. Understanding evolves between you and a child, friend or loved one. Tonight: Just be yourself.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22)
★★★★ Your fatigue or weariness with recent events breaks through, perhaps coloring your day. You might not know what is workable right now, as you simply are not firing on all cylinders. Do only what you must, and schedule some personal time. Tonight: Happy at home.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21)
★★★★★ You seem to be at the right place at the right time. Many reasons could force a smile, but recognize that your perspective could be colored by the moment. Don't worry so much; just be yourself, knowing what it is you want. Tonight: Clear out some hurt feelings.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21)
★★★★ You might be overwhelmed. Just when you thought someone was coming through, you hit a snafu. Understanding evolves in a new direction. Realize what is happening with a risk. Tonight: Take care of yourself first.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19)
★★★ Pushing someone really doesn't get the desired results. Someone you need to answer to is very stern and/or direct, creating an unanticipated problem. You can only do so much. Prioritize and communicate. Tonight: Do your own thing.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18)
★★★ Don't push beyond your normal level. How you see someone and the choices you make reflect your inner self. At this point, you are changing. Center yourself for a while before making any major decisions. Tonight: Vanish.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20)
★★★★★ Consider dealing with someone differently than in the past. A partner does not see eye to eye with you and lets you know it in no uncertain terms. Money discussions are best left for another day. A meeting proves to be supportive and informative. Tonight: Visit with a friend.

Happy birthday

This year, you often feel like someone puts the kibosh on your ideas or plans. Travel could be difficult, as could dealings with foreigners. Be open to different types of thinking and what different cultures have to offer. Spend more time with yourself reflecting on issues, and you will find this year to be easier. Many of you could opt to do volunteer work. If you are single, you could meet someone who might not be what he or she seems. Take a full year before deciding what is going on between you. If you are attached, as a couple you will gain from weekends away from your responsibilities. You could start acting like young lovers again! LIBRA seems to be more difficult than in the past.

NEWS OF THE WEIRD
BY CHUCK SHEPARD

■ Do Ask, Must Tell (and Show): The Turkish military's legendary homophobia (rare among NATO countries) comprises both zero-tolerance for homosexuality by service personnel and the requirement of rigorous proof by anyone applying for exemption from service by claiming to be gay. (Homosexuality is the only disqualifier from compulsory service for able-bodied men.) In personal experiences recounted for Foreign Policy magazine in December, some gay men seeking exemptions were ordered to verify their claims by producing witnesses to their homosexual acts, or by photographing themselves fully engaged -- and to be persuasive to authorities, the conscript had to be depicted in the "receiving" position in sexual intercourse.

■ Daring New Products: (1) Introduced at a New York food fair in January (and planned for U.S. distribution later this year): Great Scot International's potato-like chips in the "flavor" of Scotland's "national delicacy" (yes -- haggis chips!). (2) Burger King U.K.'s Christmas-season special this year (available briefly in December): a regular Whopper, garnished with a generous helping of brussels sprouts.

CrossMath + × − ÷

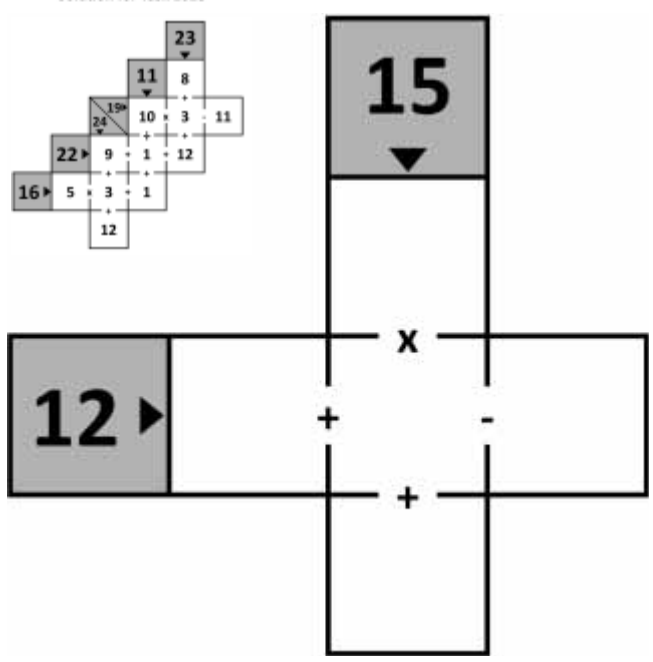

- Fill the grid with the set of given numbers (1 to 12) to satisfy the Equa demands (7 to 24) in the shaded boxes. The Equa demands represent the sum of the digits that you will insert into the empty squares.
- Each horizontal row has one Equa demand to satisfy; each vertical column also has one demand to satisfy. Each empty square in the grid dictates the math operation (addition +, subtraction -, multiplication X, and division ÷) that must be performed to meet the demands.
- You must follow the given math operations for each square and you must make sure all the numbers satisfy the demands in the shaded boxes when connected in adjacent threes and calculated together from left to right, and top to bottom.
- The numbers you insert into the grid must satisfy the Equa demands both horizontally and vertically.

Fill in the empty fields with the given numbers so when calculated together they satisfy all Equas in the gray boxes:
