NEWS OF THE WEIRD BY CHUCK SHEPARD

In November at the Tate Britain gallery, sculptor Antony Gormley presented "Bed," a pile of 8,000 slices of bread arranged to resemble a large mattress but from which Gormley had first eaten an amount out of it that represented the volume of his body. Apparently Gormley did not devour the bread so much as chew it and then remove it and form different-shaped pieces, which he then dried out, chemically preserved, and displayed. The Tate Britain was so thrilled with the installation that it became the centerpiece in a room devoted to Gormley's lifetime body of work.

TODAY IN HISTORY

In 1975, more than 40 people were killed in London's Underground when a subway train smashed into the end of a tunnel.

In 1993, a gun battle erupted at a compound near Waco, Texas, when Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents tried to serve warrants on the Branch Davidians; four agents and six Davidians were killed as a 51-day standoff began.

Hundreds gather to fight gang violence

BY JOHN WOOD

Daily Press Staff Writer

SUNSET PARK — The first words used to describe gang affiliation were love, protection, homies, family and neighborhood.

Then the group of middle and high school students meeting as part of a weekend workshop on ending gang violence in Santa Monica added to their description the words boredom, isolation, death, rape, respect, money, cars, drugs, girls, alienation, harassment, loss of manhood and weapons.

At least some parents noticed the conflicting sentiments. Tapping the perceived positive aspects of gang membership, the things that lure young people into the gang lifestyle, was one key strategy proposed for quelling gang violence.

Developing an inter-agency partnership also was suggested, as were increasing parent involvement, re-examining the way officers police local neighborhoods, partnering with the business community to offer jobs and training to youths, and developing new education programs for students, teachers and counselors.

More than 400 people turned out for the Saturday morning meeting on gang violence held at John Adams Middle School, and hosted by State Sen. Sheila Kuehl and Santa Monica City Hall. Much of the workshop was spent in small groups of 20 to 40 people, where parents, students, ex-gang members and an array of experts began to fashion a solution for ending the ongoing cycle of violence.

In a group only for youths, about 30 students, mostly from Santa Monica and Olympic high schools, offered their views on how best to deal with violence in Santa Monica and particularly in the eastside Pico neighborhood, where gangs are most entrenched and gunshots are frequent.

Asked by a facilitator who among the students was directly affected by gang violence, only one boy put up his hand. Asked who was affected through their family or neighborhood, every youth in the room raised a hand.

"Shootings on our streets," said a girl clutching a pink handbag, after the facilitator asked how the youths were affected. "Getting shot at," offered a boy slouched low in his seat and wearing baggy jeans, a white T-shirt and a striped Los Angeles Dodgers baseball cap.

The group of students agreed strongly that more counselors and mentors were needed to give advice to youngsters. Counselors who understand what it's like to be young, to live in a tough neighborhood, to have family members in gangs.

Blinky Rodriguez, one of five experts on gang violence to speak later in the meeting, said hiring ex-gang members to work with youths is effective.

"We live in extreme times, everything is extreme," said Rodriguez, an educator and motivational speaker whose 16-year-old son was killed in a drive-by shooting. "We need to be able to go out to the edge of the branch where the fruit is sweeter."

Bill Martinez, a gang-violence consultant who runs a training program at California State University of Los Angeles, agreed.

PICO NEIGHBORHOOD

Making real change in eastern Santa Monica will take more than putting gangsters behind bars; it will require building support for schools, while expanding the programs and jobs available to older youths.

That was the message delivered last week by Maria Loya, elected in January to co-chair the Pico Neighborhood Association, a

Patricia Farris answers to a higher power

BY LESLIE ANNE JONES

Special to the Daily Press

Patricia Farris' path to becoming one of Santa Monica's top religious leaders might have been driven by divine intervention, seeing as how she didn't even consider a career of serving a higher power until her years of higher education.

Having completed a tour of duty that spanned both coasts, Farris now finds satisfaction working with people from all walks of life — senior citizens, youth, the homeless, the broken-hearted, the addicted and people in crisis. Although based in Santa Monica, Farris maintains relations with communities as far away as Nigeria and Vietnam.

It's a career fit only for an adept public figure, a role that Farris has embraced as senior pastor of First United Methodist Church of Santa Monica for the past five years. She feels blessed that the congregation has accepted her, and its members feel equally blessed to be led by a woman who has decades of experience in the ministry.

The only child of an accountant and homemaker, Farris, 53, was active in her church growing up in Phoenix. There, she learned what it meant to contribute to the community and to the world.

But the thought of making a career out of it never crossed her mind — women weren't even allowed to be ordained ministers in the United Methodist Church until 1956.

Farris attended Carleton College in Minnesota, where she majored in political science and

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

From silver screen to stage, SMC delves into it all

By Daily Press staff

It's all about the arts this week at Santa Monica College.

SMC will host two events — one on Tuesday and another on Thursday — that feature a legendary dancer and a legendary director.

Fayard Nicholas, the legendary dancer who, with brother Harold, has been one of the most beloved dance teams in history, will give a free talk and show clips from his films at 11:30 a.m. Tuesday, March 1, in the Santa Monica College Art Lecture Hall 214, 1900 Pico Blvd.

The Nicholas Brothers are best known for their unforgettable appearances in more than 30 Hollywood musicals in the 1930s and '40s, "Stormy Weather" being their favorite. Their artistry combines a mix of tap, jazz, ballet and acrobatic moves.

Harold has since died, but Fayard continues to be active in the dance world.

The event is cosponsored by the SMC Associated Students and SMC Associates, a private organization that funds speakers and special programs at the college. For information, call (310) 434-4856.

And on Thursday, March 3, SMC will debut its "Master Class Series" to be taught by leading experts from the stage with a lecture by director Lenka Udovicki.

Udovicki's master class will be held at 7 p.m. in the Hangar Stage, located at SMC's Airport Campus, 2800 Airport Ave. The master classes are free and open to the public, and seating is on a first-arrival basis.

The remaining master classes for the spring semester will be "Thinking Shakespeare," led by director Barry Edelstein, on Thursday, April 7, and "The Use and Training of the Human Voice," led by voice teacher and author Arthur Lessac, on Thursday, May 12.

The series is co-sponsored by the SMC Associates. For information, call (310) 434-4393.

SURF REPORT

Monday is when the NW swell is due. This next swell is from a system diving down from the Gulf of Alaska, bringing some weather along with it. Weather models favor a strong ridge of high pressure thwarting this system far above SoCal, which might spare us foul conditions; however, the NWS is still calling for a slight rain chance. As for size, expect chest- to shoulder-high sets at most west-facing breaks in the early morning, building to overhead by the evening.

Write us at wood@smdp.com and tell us what the surf is doing today at your local break.

The Q Line

This past weekend more than 400 Santa Monicans turned out for a workshop to discuss and develop solutions for quelling gang violence in the city. Suggestions included developing an inter-agency partnership, increasing parent involvement, re-examining the way officers police local neighborhoods, partnering with the business community to offer jobs and training to youths, and developing new education programs for students, teachers and counselors.

Another workshop has been scheduled for March 12, at which time officials hope the community will formulate a specific plan for tackling the problem.

So this week, Q-Line wants to know, "What needs to be included in the community's plan to end gang violence?"

Call (310) 285-8106 before Friday at 5 p.m. and we'll print your responses in the weekend edition. Please try to limit your comments to a minute or less. It might help to think first about the wording of your response.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Find a new topic, Silverstein

Editor:

Columnist Ed Silverstein seems to have two core themes in his writing. These are the ever-present Bush bashing and the continual predictions of rampant anti-Semitism in the U.S. Last week (SMDP, Feb. 23, page 4) Ed cleverly included both themes in his column.

Last year Ed warned in his review of the "Passion of the Christ," a movie which he never actually saw, that its release would be followed by widespread outbreaks of anti-Semitism across the country. In other columns Ed predicted yet more anti-Semitic violence coming from evangelicals supported by "Bush's Christian-centric rhetoric and agenda."

Now Ed feels vindicated because at last, after much searching I'm sure, he has found a couple of regrettable but isolated examples of anti-Semitism. The massive pogroms that Ed predicted have not come to pass. There is great tolerance for all religions in this country, and Ed would do well to show more tolerance himself, especially towards evangelicals and other Christians.

And then there is also the constant Bush bashing. Ed puts all problems big, small, domestic, international, local, economic, cultural, inter-galactic on the president, even including the possible demise of rent control in Santa Monica. I fully expect that in next week's column he will attribute our recent rains to an anti-Semitic cloud seeding conspiracy engineered by Karl Rove and the White House.

Ed, time to explore some new material. You are becoming boringly repetitious.

Reliable identity cards protect liberty, security

COMMON SCENTS

BY CAROLE ORLIN

I don't believe that anyone can argue with the notion that 9/11 permanently changed the way we view our world, vote for our political leaders, prioritize how our tax dollars are spent or make our air travel plans. Although I miss the pre-9/11 innocence, however deluded that was, I find that I am learning to live in this new world. Maybe it's just adaptation. Maybe it's the fact that there is no turning back. We can't un-ring the bell. 9/11 did happen.

Really, there are only two choices. Grab the bull by the horns, accept reality and learn how to be successful in navigating this new world, or live in the past. The fact remains that we need to find new and better ways to be safer in our country now. I am convinced that we have sworn enemies that will never rest until they have annihilated us, no matter what we do. For me, part of navigating this new world is being more aware of what is happening around me, and what is happening in my government. It means getting more involved than I ever thought I would, and not taking any part of my life for granted.

When something new is proposed in the name of "homeland security," I find that I need to take particular care in checking it out thoroughly to make certain that some other agenda is not being carried out in the name of security. That very word is said often enough to get legislation enacted. What are we willing to accept to feel more secure? Who actually read or analyzed the USA Patriot Act, which Congress passed with virtually no debate only 45 days after the Sept. 11 attacks? Numerous questions have subsequently surfaced about the potential for abuse by the FBI under Section 215 of the Act. Section 215 gives broad powers to order any person or entity to turn over "any tangible things" so long as the FBI specifies the order is "for an authorized investigation ... to protect against international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities." The FBI need not show probable cause, nor reasonable grounds to believe that the person whose records it seeks is engaged in criminal activity. There is a real potential for violations of a number of individual rights under the First, Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

With that said, let's not be ignorant of the fact that some extraordinary changes in our societal obsession with "political correctness" might have to be accepted. For example, the notion of profiling airline passengers does occur, and can be a useful tool if proper safeguards are put into place. Where I can see some legitimate debate about the balancing of "rights" arising from the Patriot Act, I cannot see any legitimate controversy arising over the recent legislation that passed — by a vote of 261-161 — the U.S. House of Representatives earlier this month. This measure is called the Real ID Act (H.R. 418), and includes a series of rules that are aimed at forcing states to issue all adults federally approved electronic ID cards, including driver's licenses.

This legislation appears to be a direct response to the findings and recommendations of the National Commission on Terrorists Attacks Upon the United States, and its final report of 2004. All but one of the 9/11 hijackers acquired some form of U.S. identification documents to rent cars and apartments, buy airline tickets, pass through security checkpoints and board planes. You know the rest. The 9/11 Commission's Report pointed to identity cards and driver's licenses as central to efforts in ensuring that they are made more secure. Most Americans use their driver's licenses as their main form of identification. Passports are used less frequently. Under the rules of the House of Representatives bill, federal employees would be able to reject licenses or identity cards that do not comply with the measure, thereby restricting access to airplanes, trains, federal courthouses, national parks and other areas that are under federal jurisdiction. The legislation requires that driver's licenses and other ID cards include a digital photograph and anti-counterfeiting features. Some states already require this, others do not. Before being issued this document, the applicant would have to present a picture identity document, proof of date of birth and social security number, and documentation showing the address of his or her principal residence. The state would be required to verify the validity of these documents. Applicants would also be required to prove U. S. citizenship or lawful presence in the United States. For those temporarily in the United States, the date of expiration of the identity card would have to match the date that lawful presence in the country also expired. Three years from the date of the passage of this statute the federal government would no longer accept any other form of state identification for purposes of federal identification.

This new identity security legislation would not substantially change the types of uses or the frequency of use of driver's licenses for identification. The most significant change relates to increasing the reliability of driver's licenses, which most Americans prefer to use for ID purposes. One thing we know for sure is that for terrorists, an identity document is a way to gain access to sensitive areas. A secure system of identification will make it more difficult for a terrorist or anyone to obtain an identity document by fraud. This legislation, which has been sent to the U.S. Senate for action — and received strong support from the Bush Administration — finds itself under attack from the political left (the ACLU likened the new rules to a "de facto national ID card") and from the political right (the Gun Owners of America called the bill a "bureaucratic back door to implementation of a national ID card").

How about keeping focused on the matter at hand? In the world we live in today, reliable identity documents are critical both for promoting security and for protecting liberties.

25 roads intersect and life takes you down them

HIP TO BE SQUARE

BY CAROLINE BODKIN

The last time I saw Stephanie she was sweaty, panting and asking for water.

She'd run up to my house from hers on a Tuesday and stopped because she didn't know where to run next because she didn't have a regular route. Tuesday was a day we used to call a workday when we sat two desks apart. This was before we both quit for less exhausting jobs, and then left those as well. I pursued writing, she wanted something else, though she didn't know what, and so one week of freedom passed before she started to panic inside her life without direction.

Stephanie went to Harvard. She played competitive tennis for most of her teenage years, had already dated a small series of would-become-accomplished aristocrat types, and was prepared for a life full of challenge and fulfillment. But the most challenging thing for her on that day was having nowhere to funnel that preparation.

She left town to go back East (where her family lives, where her connections are) six months ago. The day of the run was the day before she left.

On that day, her only direction was to my house. But for someone who's had direction her whole life, it was better than nothing.

Having no direction means you're free to go anywhere. But having too many choices can keep you from making any.

It's like standing in the middle of a roundabout where (impossibly) 25 different roads intersect. After you've considered every road twice, rotating clockwise, you're dizzy and disoriented and you might even fall down.

But if you're lucky, you'll take one and stumble your way along it.

On that day, when she arrived sweaty and thirsty, we were the same in that we were both unsure about our next move, but different in that she felt a great sense of urgency about it, and I did not.

I'd chosen a road, and I was stumbling. Though I didn't know quite how things were going to turn out, I'd stopped thinking I had to. It was liberating, that feeling, and I wanted her to share it so I tried desperately, while handing Stephanie a glass of water and taking a seat with her on the couch, to explain it to her.

"It will be fine," I said, "There's a future even though you can't see it." I said, "Hey, this may be the first time in your life you haven't had to know what your next move is. Hey, this may be the best thing. You'll know what to do, after having tried 100 silly ideas. Or would you rather decide on something simply because you need a decision, then commit yourself wholly to it, only to realize, through months or years of undeniably miserable living, that it was quite definitely the wrong thing?"

"Try 100 different things," I said, "Some will click better than others, and your list of maybes will shorten."

The intersecting roads will become fewer and fewer. You have time to eliminate them.

This, I realized, after trying and trying, was better to learn than to hear.

I got a message from Stephanie the other day. She's in Boston now, and has just accepted a job but refuses to give me any details until we speak. Since she left me six months ago, she's interviewed for a variety of positions, all of which she'd be good at: Teacher, investment banker, book editor. All good jobs. In New York and Boston. All good opportunities. All relative unknowns.

Which will lead to the best possible life? Which will be the most rewarding, personally and financially? Which is right for her?

The only way to know it is to do it. She said, "It'll be fine, I just have to try."

I invited her out for a visit as soon as her schedule would allow. I suggested that we could go on a run, or a walk, or wander around the city for a day. But when we compared schedules I seemed to be booked for the next few weeks, as did she, with her new job and newer boyfriend, it seems.

So, a rain check. Until our roads cross again, and we're dizzy about something else entirely.

Second workshop scheduled for March 12

"Gang members are made, they're not born," Martinez said. "We're up against a lot of pressure."

Another workshop was scheduled for March 12, and officials said it was then that the community would formulate a specific plan for tackling gang violence in Santa Monica.

The series of meetings was called after a gunman this past fall fired 14 rounds at a bicyclist in front of an elementary school. No one was seriously injured in the incident, but it was witnessed by many school children, and solidified a group of parents and residents growing increasingly frustrated with the ongoing violence in the Pico neighborhood.

Former State Sen. Tom Hayden, an author and activist against gang violence, said reducing the ill affects of gang membership in Santa Monica will require three things: A commitment from City Hall to hire youths and former gangsters to work on public projects, a reformation of the prison system and a massive expansion of rehabilitation facilities for former gang members.

"They've been in continual violence trauma, and they've been shamed about it by others, and there are no veterans' homes," Hayden said.

The only way to make real progress, argued Leah Aldridge, associate director of youth services at the Los Angeles Commission on Assaults Against Women, was for the community to set its goals high.

"You all are the experts, and you all have the answers," said Aldridge, who drafts and manages violence-prevention programs. "We have to live the change that we want our community to be. We have to practice it."

Still, not every popular approach will work, cautioned John MacDonald, a Santa Monica resident and researcher for the RAND Corp. who has dedicated his career to studying gang violence. MacDonald said the community must choose its path carefully and realize that new programs can be expensive.

"Those cost money, and that's a challenge," said MacDonald, who offered to help craft a suitable plan for Santa Monica. "I don't know how many people here want to open their wallets or raise their taxes, so I'm trying to be a realist."

Officials closed the Saturday meeting by urging residents to return March 12 and help nail down specifics for dealing with gang violence. The goal is to formulate a two-year plan. An unspecified amount of money is available from City Hall, which last month made reducing gang violence a fiscal priority.

Young residents of the Pico neighborhood said they were hopeful the workshop might lead to significant change.

Alejandro Rodriguez, 16, a junior at Samohi, lives near the intersection of 16th Street and Delaware Avenue, where the violence is most prevalent. He said it seemed as if there was a growing interest in reducing gang violence among his peers.

"I think the youth are starting to get more involved nowadays, so they can be part of the decisions adults make for us,"

Rodriguez said after the meeting. "I see a lot of things that are wrong, a lot of negative things. Things need to change."

remained religiously active. When she graduated in 1974, Farris was sure she was headed for a career in either law or international relations. But God came calling when an opportunity to study at Harvard presented itself. Her chaplain at Carleton suggested she apply for a scholarship offered by the Rockefeller Brothers Foundation, a fellowship aiming to expand the pool of ordained ministers.

With expenses paid for one year, Farris headed to Harvard Divinity School. Her plan was to study ethics for a year and move on to international relations or law.

“But I discovered women students at the school, women teaching in all the various academic fields and had my eyes opened to real exciting new developments in the church and the whole field of religion,” Farris said. “That second year, I realized I did have that calling. I could never hear it before because there was no framework for it, no way to imagine it.”

At Harvard, Farris molded that framework to fit her passions. While getting her master’s degree, Farris met her husband, David Bremer, who now teaches literature at the OTIS College of Art and Design.

The Methodist Church appointed Farris to the campus ministry at the University of Delaware, where she ministered for five years. Farris then headed West to serve as the pastor of a small congregation in Gardena.

Farris honed her pastoral skills in Gardena for six years before moving to United University Church, near the USC campus. The congregation was a merged group of Presbyterians and Methodists. For five years, Farris was recognized as both a Presbyterian and Methodist pastor.

But then Farris was asked to step into a larger role — the Church Bishop tapped her to be the superintendent of the San Diego district. Farris was in charge of 57 congregations in Imperial and San Diego counties. During her three-year stay as superintendent, Farris dealt with pastoral appointments, congregational conflicts, and sometimes legal issues, including a highly publicized sexual abuse case involving a pastor in her district.

Her best assignment, though, has been at First United Methodist — a church as old as Santa Monica and, as a result, one with deep roots in the community. The church, located at 11th Street and Washington Avenue, is the place where countless community-wide events are held, including holiday concerts and Southern California’s largest Martin Luther King Day celebration. With 1,700 members and a long history of community involvement, Farris jumped at the chance to become the church’s senior pastor and live in this city by the sea.

The Daily Press recently caught up with Farris, who shared her thoughts on Santa Monica, the church and the community.

What’s the most fulfilling part of your job?

“Seeing lives transformed. When people catch a glimpse of a powerful calling in their own life, and I don’t mean ordained ministry, I mean vocation. That is, you know, every year our youth go on a service project, usually to Appalachia, and they go for a couple of weeks, and they go and work and come back, and for a lot of them it’s the first time they’ve seen that kind of poverty and what an impact people can make. And it changes how they think about what they’re going to do with their lives, and I love that. I love people. I think church should be a place where people’s lives are centered and grounded, and opened up to possibilities they didn’t even know were there.”

What appealed most to you about Santa Monica?

“Santa Monica is such a wonderfully unique community, within the larger metropolitan area. And really, I love Los Angeles. I love the diversity of people, and cultures ... It’s an area that faces challenges like floods and fires and earthquakes and riots and stuff like that ... Santa Monica, in the midst of all that, has such a long history. There are four-generation families within this congregation, which is remarkable for Southern California.”

Is First United Methodist one of the largest churches in Santa Monica?

“Yes. It’s the largest Protestant by far. Saint Monica’s beats us all. But we’re by far the largest Protestant congregation. So it’s got community outreach, we’ve got great facilities, which means we can do a lot with ourselves and with community groups and hosting events.”

What is the church’s mission, in Santa Monica and globally?

“This congregation is very committed to being a place where its members are always growing in faith and discipleship. So we emphasize worship, we emphasize education, small groups, fellowship groups, so that people of all ages and different stages in the life cycle find community, find friends to support and help the issues that they’re having. So a lot of ministry to the families and people of the congregation — young adult groups, people 25 to 35 years old, we have a youth program, we have a lot for children, and then that overlaps with outreach to the community.”

How many community programs does the church have?

“Oh my gosh, I never counted them.”

Would you say dozens?

“Yeah, I’d have to count them. Of course, Upward Bound House is the most tangible and visual testament to our community and its needs. The senior villa part is housing for low-income seniors. The other part of it is called Family Place. And that is for families transitioning out of homelessness. Families are screened, and it turns out to be mostly single moms and kids, and they’re screened by the staff so that they fit the program. They come, they have a place to live rent-free, and then they’re given a lot of support, counseling in parenting skills and how to save your money, and how to do a job interview and how to organize your life and set your goals and stick to them. And they save money, and when they leave, they move into their own housing situation. And the statistics are phenomenal, it’s about 90 percent of our families are now, still, in stable situations.”

How long do they stay?

“Now they’re moving after around a three- to four-month stay, which is much shorter than we initially thought. And it’s because we’ve been at it now for several years, and the program is really very strong and very efficient.”

How else is First United Methodist Church involved in Santa Monica?

“The health ministry for example: We had a program Wednesday and Thursday that was co-sponsored by St. John’s Hospital on women’s cardiac health. And all together I think we had 450 people that were there on those two days to hear three speakers talk about women’s cardiac health. This has been one of our newer ministries, in terms of expanding public education around those kind of issues, or partnering. We do a lot partnering with other organizations whether it’s the hospital or Santa Monica College, the Martin Luther King Coalition, the space is used by boy scout troops and girl scout troops. I think we host 10 or 12 12-step groups.”

What’s the biggest challenge facing Santa Monica?

“I think one of the big issues facing our community centers around what I might call ‘quality of life’ issues. Whether it’s ‘How do we grow in ways that are healthy and manageable?’ or ‘How do we continue to evolve as a community with policies about growth and development that are going to make sense and be manageable?’ The things that people have always loved about living here — quality education, community life, neighborhood, safety, civic involvement — how do we maintain all that and forward? And I think that the church is a place that holds up all those values. I think that as we become increasingly more affluent of a community, for some, it becomes harder for more middle class people to live here. It used to be that the middle was really our (the church’s) base, so the question becomes how do we relate, on the one hand, to very affluent people, and on the other hand, to people of limited means, who are here mostly working in homes, in restaurants, in the service industry and so on. How do we reach out to them in ways that are meaningful? That’s not only our challenge, I think it’s the challenge of the community.”

How do you prepare for Sunday sermons?

“Sometimes people say, ‘Why can’t you just pull out an old sermon?’ I could never do that. I mean, I might take a paragraph or something, but I could never do that because the world is always changing, whether it’s our immediate community or the larger world. So I read a lot, I watch the news a lot, and I try to just pay attention to what’s going on out there. And I try to have a broad range of interests because, again, our congregation is really diverse. Some of them love sports, some of them love health issues, some of them are in business, some of them are in academia, some of them are really most focused right now on their families and their kids, so I try to pay attention to what’s going on at all those levels. I do take Thursdays as my day. I don’t even come in here because it’s too distracting. It’s my day for study and writing. I’ll do some tweaking on Friday and Saturday, and sometimes I’ll throw it out on Saturday, luckily that doesn’t happen too often, but it’s kind of scary when it does. Every Sunday, it’s kind of a relentless schedule, it comes around real frequently — every week — there it is.”

The ultimate deadline?

“Exactly. There’s no escaping it. You know, there are some Sundays where I think, ‘This maybe isn’t going as well as I wished it would,’ and yet somebody listening will say, ‘You spoke to me today, what you said was exactly what I needed to hear.’ And I just have to thank God, because you know I just do my best. I try to keep my mind open, my heart open, my spirit open, and then I just put it out there.”

What’s your philosophy on life?

“Life is a beautiful gift; we’re given this amazing creation, amazing bodies, amazing people around us, it must be enjoyed, it should be cherished, it should be fought for. We’re created in communities, so it’s not about selfishness at all, it’s about connecting with people and helping to make the world a more just place. I think we have a responsibility beyond ourselves. Most of us here are really fortunate. We have a lot of material resources, we’ve been given a lot of opportunity, I certainly have. So I have a lot of responsibility back. I don’t think I’ve ever been asked that before. That’s a great question.”

What’s your favorite thing about living in Santa Monica?

“Movies, friends. I mean it’s an amazing community, what great people — people involved in this community in so many ways, I love that. People have a stake in what happens.”

What’s your least favorite thing about living in Santa Monica?

“We can all become insulated — from even the rest of L.A., and it’s tempting to get too comfortable, I think, and it’s not inherently bad, it’s just if that closes us off to people’s needs and the needs of the world.”

What’s the future plans for the church, locally? What do you have going on?

“We have a new director in the nursery school ... We’re always strengthening our music program, we’ll provide some great concerts for people, and we’re going to refurbish our social hall this year and really bring it up to date and get new lighting and a new sound system and make it an even better venue for serving our community. Sending the kids back to Appalachia this summer. We have a new covenant partner relationship with the Methodist Church in Nigeria, and our associate pastor Larry Young has been (to Nigeria). We also, our health ministry nurse went to Vietnam on a medical mission team there, and we’re exploring ways to send more of our folks both to Vietnam and Nigeria.

“Also more short-term involvement opportunities for people in the congregation more locally. So, take a Saturday and work with the homeless, or work at one of the community centers, or work with the hungry, or take a few days of your vacation and go work. We’re encouraging. We’re not to the planning stage yet, but we’re getting close, because we know that not everybody can go to Nigeria.”

Can you address the Methodist Church’s recent decision not to recognize same-sex marriages?

“The Methodist Church is a very big denomination, and, as I said to you, it is now global. So it brings together people of very conservative social values as well as people of very liberal social values, or moderate. My own personal point of view is that over time it needs to become a place where everyone is accepted and respected. The Methodist Church in the west has always been, actually, a place where diversity was valued. We’ve always been open, we’ve always embraced diversity. We’ve always been more open minded in the sense of accepting people where they were and then saying, ‘Let’s focus on the work of the church, the needs of the community, whoever we are, let’s come together and let mission be our focus.’”

Maintaining diversity a priority for Pico neighborhood group

group of area residents that meets monthly.

Loya, 33, said the organization's top three goals over the next year will be increasing support for Pico youths, promoting a broader, community-based policing model and working to maintain diversity throughout Santa Monica.

"The issues and the needs of the Pico neighborhood are the issues that affect Santa Monica as a whole," Loya said in a Friday interview. "These are the issues that affect all Santa Monicans, whether you live in the borders of the Pico neighborhood or not. We all need to be a part of the solutions."

"There isn't one organization or one individual that's going to make a difference," Loya added. "This has to be a holistic approach, and it has to involve every sector."

Loya and a group of like-minded residents took control of the PNA in the fall of 2003, shortly after a young Pico man was shot and killed half a block from his apartment. She said the old leaders of the PNA were out of touch with many of the neighborhood's needs and didn't reflect its diversity.

"There were different things that were going on," Loya said. "The whole point was to increase representation in the neighborhood association in order to be able to address issues such as youth violence and address issues of affordable housing, but address it in a less reactionary way."

"Our goal was to continue to engage the residents in the community but also make sure that the residents in that neighborhood had the attention that they needed," Loya continued. "Basically we felt that the past PNA really wasn't working effectively with the city government or wasn't working effectively with any other group in the city, so the result of that was that the residents were also being ignored and marginalized."

To remedy the perceived shortcomings, the new PNA relied heavily on advocacy, speaking plainly and forcefully about Pico resident concerns at meetings of the local school board and City Council, and numerous other boards and commissions. The idea, Loya said, was to initiate discussion.

"Really present a human face, present the fact that there are families living there," Loya added. "A lot of the people that hear about the Pico neighborhood only heard the negative. We wanted to talk about the needs and the issues, but we wanted it to come from a humanistic point."

With City Hall's recent commitment to focus time and money on reducing gang violence in Santa Monica, Loya said the opportunity is ripe for change in the Pico neighborhood. As to specifics, she said the emphasis should be on youths.

The PNA has created a $500 scholarship program for graduating high school students it hopes to expand, and Loya said the PNA will continue to meet with parents and students to gauge what issues they view as most important, while advocating for increased support of public schools.

Loya said the PNA also will push for expanded youth programs, particularly at the new Virginia Avenue Park, which is currently under construction. She said the programs need to serve older youths as well as junior high school students.

"This community has waited for more than 12 years for this park, and during these two years of construction, this community has been left without a park — but more importantly without services," Loya said.

Creating more jobs for Pico youths and partnering with the city and local businesses to form training and apprentice programs also will be top goals of the PNA, Loya said.

"In particular for our older youth, we feel that there needs to be training," Loya added, saying future developments could be built by local laborers. "There is no reason why those jobs cannot be provided to our residents. People can't just walk off the street and begin work as an electrician or plumber.

"They need training."

Another top priority of the PNA, according to Loya, will be working collaboratively with police, school officials and other stake holders to develop a community-based policing model that more fully engages an array of residents.

Though the Santa Monica Police Department uses a model called "Neighborhood-Centered Policing," which assigns high-ranking officers to specific portions of the city, some residents and elected leaders have criticized the police department for not more fully engaging all Santa Monica residents.

Loya said she hoped to address public safety in a "smart way," meaning a heightened focus on intervention and prevention strategies to keep youths out of jail.

"We understand that the police cannot do it alone, and the community cannot do it alone either," Loya said. "We want to work with the police department, along with the schools and other stake holders in the community to increase and enhance public safety. The community and ... some of the people within the PNA have always realized and always recognized that we need to work with the police. Working with the police does not mean that we can't hold our appointed officials accountable."

A third priority for the PNA, Loya said, is to keep the eastside Pico neighborhood diverse.

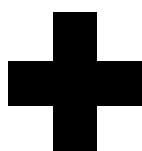

Doing so will require playing an active role in a current process to update the city's general plan, a document expected to govern development in Santa Monica for the next two decades. It also will require weighing in on any specific development projects in the Pico neighborhood, Loya said.

Finally, Loya said protecting rent control and promoting affordable home ownership for residents would be key to maintaining the character of the Pico neighborhood.

"Right now, our residents, we're struggling for survival," Loya said. "If we don't do anything right now to establish safeguards, Santa Monica is going to look very different in the next five to 10 years, the Pico neighborhood is going to look very different. We want to preserve the diversity as much as possible."

Disney sells Mighty Ducks to billionaire Henry Samueli

BY KEN PETERS

AP Sports Writer

ANAHEIM, Calif. — The billionaire operators of the Arrowhead Pond where the National Hockey League's Mighty Ducks of Anaheim play their home games have agreed to buy the team from the Walt Disney Co. for an undisclosed sum.

The purchase by Henry Samueli and his wife, Susan, must still be approved by the league.

The Ducks, meanwhile, haven't played since a lockout wiped out the entire 2004-2005 NHL season, and the future of the league remains uncertain.

Agents for players plan to meet with union representatives next week for an update on labor talks, a day after the players' association meets with its rank and file.

Samueli said the deal with Disney was struck "pretty much independent of what's going on between the league and the players."

"Disney has had them up for sale for quite a while and we've been negotiating with them," he said in a phone interview. "This was a natural next step. The synergy was there since we already are operating the Arrowhead Pond."

"We're buying the team with a long-term plan in mind. We're assuming this (the labor dispute) will get settled shortly. We're assuming things will get cleaned up and we'll have a long and healthy future with the team."

Samueli said he fully intends to keep the team at the Pond, and that he won't be changing the name to Los Angeles Mighty Ducks of Anaheim. Arte Moreno, who bought the Angels from Disney in 2003, recently caused a stir by changing the team's name from Anaheim Angels to Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim.

"My wife and I are longtime residents of Orange County and supporters of Orange County and Anaheim, and we're happy to use the name Anaheim," Samueli said. "The Mighty Ducks have become a wonderful asset to this community, with a terrific following, a history of winning and a strong nucleus of outstanding young prospects and talented veterans."

Disney paid $50 million for the Ducks to join the NHL as an expansion franchise in 1992. Samueli's initial offer to Disney reportedly was in the $50 million to $60 million range.

Although the Ducks were Western Conference champions and went to the Stanley Cup finals during the 2002-2003 season, Disney has had them on the market for years.

"We are confident that Henry and Susan Samueli will bring continued success to the Ducks, and we will remain among the biggest fans of the team going forward," Disney Chief Executive Officer Michael Eisner said.

Samueli, co-founder, chairman of the board and chief technical officer of Broadcom Corp., believes the Ducks will be able to lure fans back when the labor dispute is settled.

"It's never good for the fan base when you have a lockout, but the Mighty Ducks have done really well over the years," he said. "We will make sure we do everything in our power to make it a winning team and a profitable team."

"I think we can restore confidence in the sport not only here, but across the country."

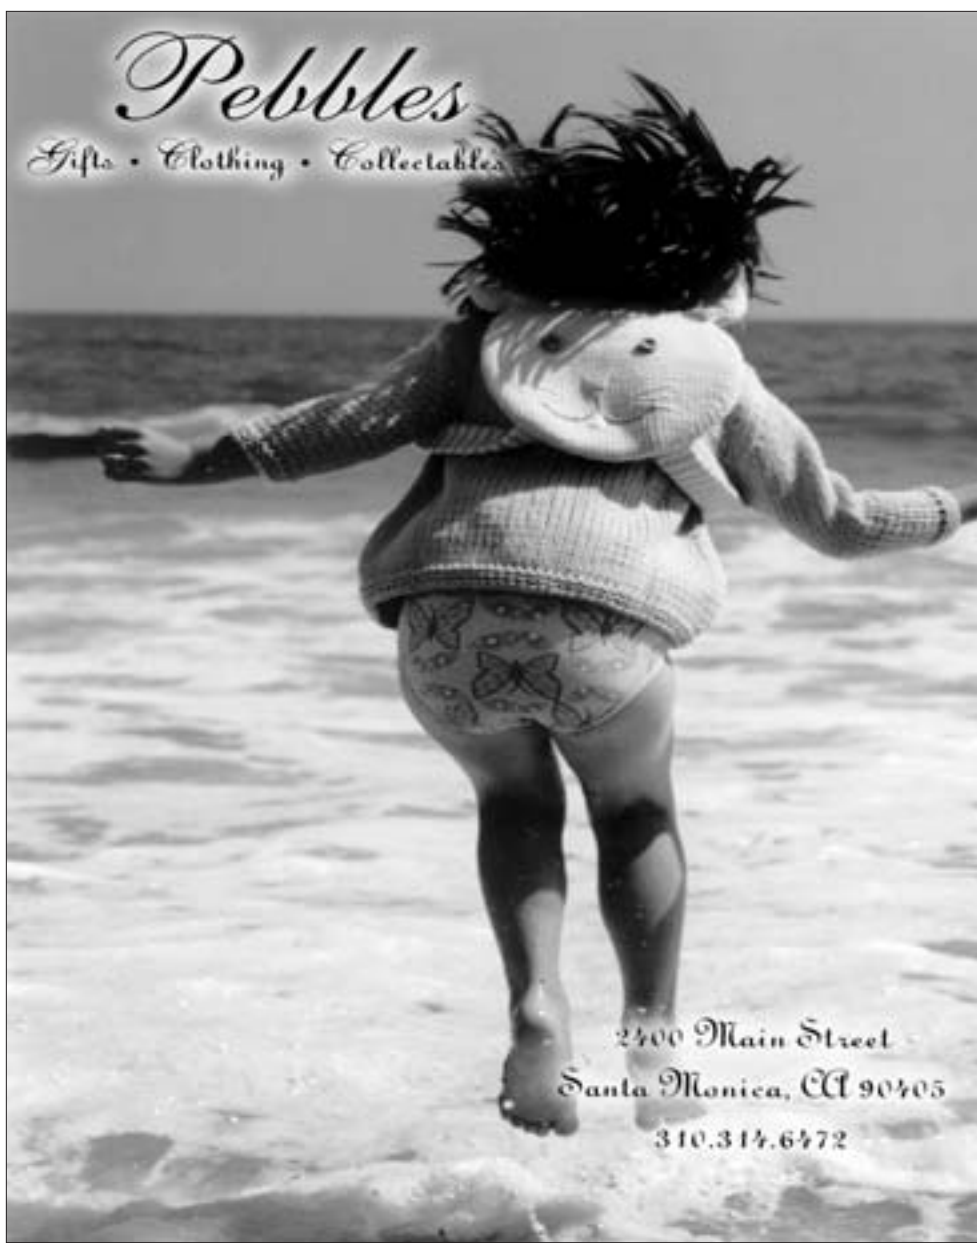

The team's whimsical name, bestowed by Eisner after the Disney movie of the same title, and their distinctly bright uniforms and duck calls from the fans, helped make the Mighty Ducks a hit both at the gate and in the merchandising department the first few years.

Attendance eventually began to lag, then there was a resurgence when the spectacular goaltending of Jean-Sebastien Giguere propelled the Ducks into their first Stanley Cup finals.

Although Anaheim lost to New Jersey in seven games, Samueli — an avid fan of many sports — recalled, "For me personally, those were some of the most exciting sports events. My wife and I were at every home game, and it was something, the excitement of the crowds, the noise."

The Ducks failed to make the playoffs the following season, and attendance dwindled again. But that didn't affect Samueli, who might be the Ducks' second most fervent supporter — behind only his wife.

"She is very excited, maybe more excited than I am," he said, laughing.

Hunting groups work to keep youth in the hunt

BY LEON D'SOUZA

Associated Press Writer

SMITHFIELD, Utah — It's hard to miss the romance in Bruce Schoniger's description of his first time in the wilderness — the warm crackle of the campfire, the smells of frying bacon and meat roasting, and of course, the excitement of the kill.

But a combination of urbanization and cultural change is conspiring against efforts by Schoniger and other longtime hunters to share that experience with a generation of youth, whose only exposure to hunting may be in video games.

"Today, hunting is in danger," said Schoniger, 44, a Smithfield deer enthusiast who helps run an informal hunting club in northern Utah.

The number of young hunters has dropped nationally. According to the Sporting Goods Manufacturers Association, youth participation declined by 26 percent between 1990 and 2000.

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, which compiles outdoor recreation statistics, says youth hunting participation has stabilized in recent years. But the National Wild Turkey Federation found only 25 percent of children from hunting households actively participate in hunting today.

"When I was young, we'd go out and there'd be 20 of us," said Dave Bunce, who co-founded the northern Utah hunting club with Schoniger. "A lot of that tradition is disappearing."

Some, like Bob St.Pierre of Pheasants Forever, a Minnesota-based conservation group, believe urbanization and modernization have drastically changed way youth think about the environment and thus, hunting.

"Kids believe that food comes from the grocery store," St.Pierre said. "They don't go to the store and connect the steak they see to a cow. There's a disconnect between the grocery store and the outdoors."

His organization's Leopold Education Project — a partnership with other conservation groups named after famed conservationist Aldo Leopold — is trying to change that. The group teaches youth to think about the human impact on the natural world through a series of outdoor workshops that also serve to pass on the methods of wilderness survival.

"We teach kids how to use a compass, learn about conservation, and then through our Youth Mentor Hunt, they go out in the field with a mentor," St.Pierre said.

Other national hunting groups also are encouraging supervised or mentor hunting and are working hard to persuade states to foster youth-friendly hunting for pre-teens. That underscores a consensus among hunting advocates that the decline in young hunters can only be curbed if youth are attracted to the sport before they become teens.

"Times have changed," said Rob Sexton, spokesman for the U.S. Sportsmen's Alliance. "By the time a kid's 10 or 12, he's a disciple of soccer or some other activity."

At least 23 states restrict the age for hunting big game. Most western states don't allow youth under 13 to hunt big game. Even at that age and older, teens must meet rigorous hunter education requirements.

While acknowledging the necessity of safe and educated hunting, the requirements are a problem, Sexton says, because they depress the number of young people who take up the sport.

The National Wild Turkey Federation, the Sportsmen's Alliance and the National Shooting Sports Foundation are lobbying restrictive states to lift limits on youth hunting opportunities. The efforts are showing results in a few Midwestern states.

For example, starting this spring, Nebraska youth between 12 and 15 will be allowed two statewide turkey permits during the state's archery and shotgun seasons. The Nebraska Game and Parks Commission also sanctioned a one-week, youth-only turkey season in April.

The season will give young hunters the chance to hunt turkeys before regular shotgun season begins. Other previously restrictive states, such as Kansas, are following Nebraska's lead.

For Utah's Schoniger, such initiatives are vital to the future of a tradition he holds dear — a future he worries about.

"If we don't keep kids interested, hunting will disappear," he said.

Animal-rights activists doggedly oppose hunting as cruel

BY MARTHA MENDOZA

AP National Writer

SAN FRANCISCO — The videos they show at the training camp for animal activists aren't for the squeamish. Students grimace and cringe — some start to sob — as images of wounded animals flash on the screen.

At the camp sponsored by People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, would-be activists are taught about the horrors of hunting, trapping and breeding animals for fur. Then, they learn the tools — from writing letters to the editor to staging rowdy protests — that PETA uses to try to shut them down.

"If you approach the hunters, in a nonconfrontational way and just talk to them in a reasonable and level way, you can really change a lot of minds," facilitator Don Shannon said. "I see it happen all the time."

They haven't changed the mind of John Jackson, who has hunted for the past 30 years and chairs the Metairie, La.-based Conservation Force, a hunting and wildlife advocacy organization. He's encountered so many animal rights activists, he knows some by their first names.

"They bandy about like chickens. I'd like them to go find something better to do," he said.

The nation's leading animal protection groups have taken aim at hunting since they were formed in the 1970s, dedicating millions of dollars and thousands of hours to the cause.

They cite some victories: A bison hunt in Montana was canceled in January after Gov. Brian Schweitzer expressed misgivings about the potential bad publicity, and in December the New Jersey Supreme Court barred a bear hunt after activists argued that the state lacks a proper management program for the animals. In the past year, about a dozen hunts — for deer, pigeon, dove and Canada goose — were canceled after pressure from animal rights groups.

"People who like making wildlife dead have less bravado these days. They realize they're going to get less applause than they used to for driving home with a dead deer tied on their roof rack," said Priscilla Feral, president of Friends of Animals. She claims their anti-hunting magazine advertisements, billboards, legislative lobbying and protests have made hunting less popular.

PEOPLE IN THE NEWS

Gibson gives a multimillion-dollar handshake

By The Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Mont. — Actor Mel Gibson has sold his 45,000-acre Beartooth Ranch in a multimillion-dollar handshake deal with a neighbor, the buyers said.

Kent and Pam Williams said they signed the deed in the last week, but said the agreement prevents either party from divulging the purchase price.

"Pam and I were worried that if it got in the wrong hands, the valley would be subdivided and split up," Kent Williams told The Billings Gazette, which reported the sale Sunday.

The actor and director bought the ranch in 1988, and the Williams own the adjoining 2,000-acre ranch.

"We shared an awful lot of fence," Williams said. "He's been a real good neighbor."

They made a verbal deal to purchase the ranch in January. "Everything was on a handshake," Williams said.

Ranch manager John Carrel said Gibson declined to comment.

NEW YORK — The opening of the Broadway revival of "The Glass Menagerie" has been pushed back by a week to give its newest cast member — Christian Slater — more time in front of an audience.

Slater joins "Menagerie" March 8, replacing Dallas

Roberts as Tom, the narrator of the Tennessee Williams drama.

It was to have opened March 15 at New York's Ethel Barrymore Theatre. It will now open March 22, Philip Rinaldi, a spokesman for the show, said Sunday.

Slater recently won rave reviews in London for his performance in "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest" and has appeared in such films as "Heathers," "Robin Hood: Prince of Thieves," "Windtalkers" and "Tucker."

The revival, directed by David Leveaux, stars Jessica Lange as the domineering mother, Amanda Wingfield.

ST. PAUL, Minn. — A man who thinks he has written a script perfect for Josh Hartnett has taken out a half-page newspaper ad in the actor's hometown to catch his attention.

Paul Martin Hennessey said he does not know anyone in Hollywood and failed to reach Hartnett's agent through traditional means. So, he took out an ad in City Pages, a free alternative newspaper in St. Paul.

"Dear Josh Hartnett," the ad reads. "In the land of the free and the home of the brave where equal opportunity is open to all, there seems to be a gap in the American Dream, actually, more of a catch 22."

Hennessey, of Alton, Mo., said his script about a 1942 fatal fire at a Boston night club could earn the star of "Pearl Harbor" and "Black Hawk Down" an Academy Award.

"A hero emerged from the fire," Hennessey, 59, told the St. Paul Pioneer Press. "He was in the Coast Guard and just happened to be there that night. It's more about the hero and his recovery."

Hartnett, 26, is a 1996 graduate of Minneapolis South High School. His family still lives in St. Paul.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Former President Bill Clinton plans to address members of the City Year service organization at their national convention this spring, organizers said.

The Clinton Presidential Library in Little Rock will host part of the convention. Clinton inaugurated City Year Little Rock during his library's opening week in November.

National City Year Chairman Eli Segal says about 1,500 people are expected to attend the convention, scheduled for May 31 through June 5.

"This is mostly a platform for young people to see how they can get involved in the community through City Year and beyond," Segal said.

City Year was founded in 1988 in Boston. Participants perform a year of community service in exchange for a college scholarship. It is partly funded by Americorps, the national service program created by Clinton and modeled on City Year.
