Tenants threatened with eviction during coronavirus pandemic

MADELEINE PAUKER
SMDP Staff Writer

Santa Monica put a temporary moratorium on evictions Saturday to prevent people financially impacted by coronavirus from losing their homes during the worst public health crisis in 100 years.

One property manager didn't get the message.

An employee in the Newport Beach office of Marshall Reddick Real Estate, a nationwide real estate firm that manages multiple properties in the Los Angeles area, sent an email to tenants Thursday informing them that they must pay rent next month or face eviction.

"Just as we are all expected to pay for food in the grocery store and gas at the pump, rent is expected to be paid to have a roof over our heads," the email said. "We want to encourage everyone to prioritize their expenditures starting with rent, utilities and food."

The firm admitted that "every American's income is being affected right now" but assured renters that "as with all things in time this will pass with better times ahead" before encouraging them to check FEMA's website for resources and aid.

Jake Greve, who has lived for seven years in a small apartment building in Santa Monica that Marshall Reddick manages, replied to the email with a reminder that Santa Monica City Manager Rick Cole had five days earlier signed an emergency order prohibiting landlords from evicting tenants who can show they have lost income due to coronavirus or its impacts on the economy.

On Wednesday, Santa Monica extended the suspension on evictions to businesses affected by COVID-19 and clarified that residential and commercial tenants will have to make up any unpaid rent six months after the pandemic is over. Wednesday's emergency order also suspended evictions pursuant to the Ellis Act, a 1985 state law that allows landlords to take units off the market if they wish to exit the rental business.

"Hope your legal team is staying up to date in these times," Greve wrote in a response that he shared on reddit.com/r/losangeles, the subreddit for Angelenos.

Greve said in an interview that while his income hasn't been affected, his roommate had lost both his jobs after his employers shut down under state and county orders to slow the spread of coronavirus. With millions of renters across the country in similar situations, he said he felt Marshall Reddick's email was condescending and tone deaf.

"Two weeks prior to rent even being due, they just let everyone know they don't care what's going on," he said.

After Greve's post gained traction on Reddit, Marshall Reddick sent an apology email to tenants that he felt once again missed the point.

"Please know that while we empathize with everything that is occurring, we are contractually obligated to operate by our standard

Businesses attempting to adapt

Less than a month ago, the streets of Santa Monica were chalk-full with residents rushing into retailers to prepare for their Valentine's Day dates. Salons, restaurants and boutiques from Venice to Malibu were packed as significant others sought out the perfect gift.

Today, the COVID-19 pandemic has given retailers plenty of time to reminisce on days' past as it has drastically changed the everyday lives of many residents on the Westside and forced many local establishments to quickly adapt if they want to avoid shuttering their doors permanently.

Sam Trude, owner and founder of Venice's Great White cafe, said this week that his establishment is lucky to have a strong base of loyal

Community comes together to help seniors combat COVID-19

BRENNON DIXSON
SMDP Staff Writer

On a random trip to the grocery store Friday night, Lorena Camarena encountered what thousands of local residents have in recent days — empty shelves and dozens of seniors scanning the aisles in search of necessary supplies.

When Camarena returned to her Santa Monica apartment building, she bumped into an 83-year-old woman wearing a mask and gloves who had recently gone shopping as well. After Camarena gifted her neighbor a bottle of hand sanitizer, the two engaged in a short conversation about the "awful grocery experience" and how much of a risk it is to venture outside.

The senior shared that she wasn't able to get anything she needed, "but what stuck with me most," Camarena said, "was her comment that she's playing Russian Roulette… and that's not a game she plays."

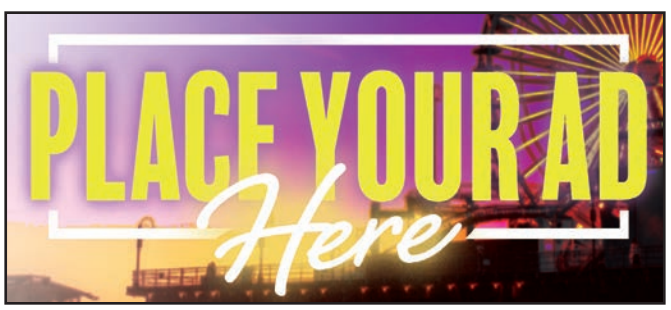

Fast forward to Saturday night, Camarena said, "I went on NextDoor and I was seeing a lot of people were posting that they're going to get groceries and run errands, and there were a lot of responses."

But seniors aren't on NextDoor, "so I started at 9 p.m. and was up until 4 a.m. putting together a strategy, a website, (and) a contact form so there can be a centralized effort for seniors and volunteers together."

"So that led me to start an organization called Santa

District Attorney Jackie Lacey Directs Deputy District Attorneys To Help Reduce Jail Population During Pandemic

Los Angeles County District Attorney Jackie Lacey announced last week that she has directed her deputy district attorneys to take steps to reduce the number of people both in local jails and courthouses as part of her office's response to help curb the spread of the coronavirus.

"I have asked my attorneys to consider the health risks in every decision they make," District Attorney Lacey said. "I have directed them to consider ways to keep nonviolent felony and misdemeanor offenders out of our jails and courthouses during this pandemic."

District Attorney Lacey instructed her managers during a March 16 video chat to delay the filing of new cases and re-evaluate pretrial cases to allow nonviolent offenders who do not pose a danger to the community to remain outside the criminal justice system during this national emergency. She urged them to look at both the pending charges and the defendant's criminal history to determine their risk to the community at this time.

In keeping with that directive, District Attorney Lacey is working with Sheriff Alex Villanueva, Public Defender Ricardo Garcia and Alternate Public Defender Erika Anzoategui to review approximately 2,000 cases involving in-custody defendants using the same standards to determine if they are a risk to public safety or can be safely returned to the community on their own recognizance while awaiting trial. If they cannot reach an agreement on a particular defendant, the court will review the case and make a determination.

Earlier, in a March 14 email to all employees, District Attorney Lacey directed her deputy district attorneys to consider whether a defendant is considered by health officials to be at a high risk of exposure to coronavirus as a factor in either setting bail or agreeing to a defendant's release on his or her own recognizance.

To help further reduce the jail population, District Attorney Lacey has instructed her deputy district attorneys to not request that defendants be remanded on probation or parole violations on nonviolent and non-serious crimes unless the defendant has demonstrated that he or she is a danger to the community.

She has recommended that deputy district attorneys use the Proposition 115 guidelines that allow law enforcement officers to testify to witness statements at preliminary hearings in an effort to reduce the number of civilian witnesses having to appear in courthouses during the pandemic.

District Attorney Lacey also has directed Head Deputy District Attorneys to expand the use of the existing Pre-filing Diversion Program (PDP). This program diverts people from entering the criminal justice system on specified misdemeanors and felonies by opting for office hearings as opposed to criminal filings.

As for setting future court dates, deputy district attorneys were advised against objecting to continuances unless necessary to prevent a serious case from being dismissed.

Additionally, deputy district attorneys were informed that they should concur with requests for general time waivers and continuances of jury trials for an extended period of time for out-of-custody defendants.

As to community service, including work performed through the California Department of Transportation, deputy district attorneys were directed to temporarily suspend or extend pending due dates for completion and not use these options at this time unless completion dates may be extended beyond the usual due dates. In addition, they are being directed to agree to put progress reports over for several months.

District Attorney Lacey also has released new Fraud Alerts warning consumers about coronavirus-related scams and price gouging and posted a video message addressing the impact of the coronavirus on her office's operations. They may be viewed at http://da.lacounty.gov.

In an effort to reduce the spread of this disease, District Attorney Lacey has implemented alternate work schedules for all of her 2,200 employees. This includes flexible work schedules and using technology so that attorneys and other staff members may work remotely.

Employees have been encouraged to prepare for trials, interview witnesses, conduct legal research and, in some cases, even file criminal cases remotely, when possible.

No District Attorney employee has been diagnosed with COVID-19. In an abundance of caution, all employees making reports of possible exposure to the coronavirus are assigned to telework until the guidelines provided by the county's Public Health Department for a safe return to work are followed.

District Attorney Lacey continues to work closely with county and court officials to determine how best we can continue to maintain public safety during this public health crisis.

"We have a constitutional duty to serve the public by keeping the residents of Los Angeles County safe from violent crime, even during national emergencies," District Attorney Lacey said. "I want to thank the people in my office for their dedication and cooperation during these unprecedented times."

Is the permafrost melting

DEAR EARTHTALK: HOW IS MELTING PERMAFROST AFFECTING COMMUNITIES IN THE ARCTIC AND BEYOND? -- WILLIAM JAMES, BARRE, VT

In the northern regions of the world, a great change is taking place. Permafrost, which covers around 25 percent of exposed land in the Northern Hemisphere, is melting. Defined as a layer of soil that remains completely frozen for over two years at a time, permafrost is often located a meter or so below the surface. Its thawing creates issues for both the environment and human infrastructure.

These issues result largely because that water expands and hardens when it freezes, and does the opposite when it melts. When the water in soil freezes, it acts somewhat like cement, maintaining structure and stability. Initial efforts to develop cities and towns in these northern regions over the last century led to countless buildings and roads being built on top of ground held together by permafrost. Now, thawing is putting this infrastructure in jeopardy.

In the remote Arctic settlement of Tuktoyaktuk in Canada's Northwest Territories, thawing permafrost is a huge problem for the 1,000 or residents who live there. Melting permafrost there means that houses that have stood for decades are now collapsing. And it's not just buildings. The entire coastline, once held in place by the permafrost, is rapidly disappearing into the ocean. In some Arctic areas, coastal land is eroding at a rate of up to two meters per year. The thawing permafrost also compromises both land and sea transportation. All across the northern parts of the world, roads are beginning to buckle as the ground beneath them shifts. In some instances, roads are rendered impassable. On the ocean, erosion driven by thawing permafrost is filling in shipping channels, some of which are already too shallow for boat traffic.

Unfortunately, all of these issues pale compared to the effects that the thawing permafrost could have on the climate. While frozen, the organic matter stored in permafrost is relatively inert. Once it thaws, however, bacteria and other microorganisms immediately begin to digest it. Two of the primary byproducts of this digestion are methane and carbon dioxide, both potent greenhouse gases. Around three times more organic (and digestible) material is stored in the permafrost than there is in all the forests left on the planet. All in all, the permafrost stores more carbon than humans have released into the atmosphere since the beginning of the Industrial Revolution.

The digestion of this organic matter could create a dangerous feedback loop, whereby warming triggers in-creased bacterial activity—and greenhouse gas emissions—in turn triggering more warming. Researchers worry that by 2100, 70 percent of the world's permafrost may have thawed. If it does it will likely release about 10 percent of total permafrost-stored carbon (150 billion tons) into the atmosphere.

The solution is in our hands. If we can start ratcheting down our emissions significantly, we can reduce the total thawing to just 30 percent of the permafrost by the end of the century. Traveling and consuming less—and spreading the word to your family, friends, neighbors and coworkers—are the two most important things you can do to move the needle in the right direction for everybody, human or otherwise.

‘A really big experiment’: Parents turn teachers amid virus

CAROLYN THOMPSON
Associated Press

After her sixth-grade son’s school in Buffalo, New York, closed amid the coronavirus outbreak, Roxanne Ojeda-Valentin returned to campus with shopping bags to take home textbooks and weeks’ worth of assignments prepared by teachers.

A single mother with a full-time job, she now joins millions of parents around the country — and the world — suddenly thrust into the role of their children’s primary educators, leaving them scrambling to sift through educational resources and juggle lesson plans with jobs and other responsibilities.

“It’s a really big experiment,” Ojeda-Valentin said as she left the school, her second stop after picking up materials from her fourth-grade daughter’s school.

Even in school districts that are providing remote instruction, the burden falls on parents to keep their children on task. In others, parents are left to find educational websites and curricular materials on their own. And while the challenges are daunting for all, they can be nearly impossible to overcome for parents limited by access to technology and their own levels of education.

Across the United States, more than 118,000 public and private schools in 45 states have closed, affecting 53 million students, according to a tally kept by Education Week. While many closures were initially announced as short-term, parents are wondering if schools will reopen this academic year as the outbreak intensifies.

After Kansas became the first state to announce schools would remain closed for the year, a task force recommended from 30 minutes of work a day for the youngest students to up to three hours daily for students in sixth grade and up. California Gov. Gavin Newsom also has urged the state’s more than 6 million schoolchildren and their families to make long-term plans, telling them few, if any, schools would reopen before summer.

Los Angeles father Filiberto Gonzalez’s three children have daily contact with their teachers and one to four hours of work they can do on an existing online platform that supplements classes. But he never thought the arrangement would transform from a stopgap measure to permanent situation.

“The news ... was a real shock to a lot of us,” he said.

In Portland, Oregon, Katie Arnold’s 7-year-old son has been spending his days in his mother’s office, keeping busy on an iPad and her laptop while she’s managing accounts for a catering company.

Oregon has shut down schools through April 28 and some districts have put optional activities online, though they are not meant to replace the regular curriculum. While her son’s district explores virtual learning, she has been combing the internet and tapping friends for suggestions.

“Scholastic had a bunch of free things and I have a friend who’s a teacher, so I’ve gotten a lot of workbook pages for him to do, just to try to keep him busy,” said Arnold, who also has been using educational websites like ABCmouse.

Arnold is making plans with other parents to teach children in small groups if the closure is extended, and is resigned to the idea that her workdays will be followed by evening school sessions.

“We’ll muster through it,” she said.

Some parents are turning to those with experience homeschooling for guidance, unsure of whether to enforce strict schedules and where to look for academic help. Amid an influx of interest, the National Home School Association dropped its membership fee from $39 to $10 for access to tip sheets and teaching materials, executive director Allen Weston said.

The online site Outschool saw 20,000 new students enroll during a single weekend in March, compared to the 80,000 who have attended class since its 2017 launch, CEO Amir Nathoo said. The company offers live, teacher-led online classes beginning at $5 each, but has also offered free webinars on running online classes through video conferencing.

Child development researcher Jessica Logan and her husband continue to work full-time from home and have been tag-teaming school-related questions from their 8- and 12-year-old children, home from Columbus City Schools in Ohio.

“I see all these people writing out, ‘Here are the six hours we’re going to spend each day doing homework,’ and was like, ‘Not happening in my house,’” she said. “When am I going to get my work done? I still have my own work to do, so does my husband. Neither of us can take the entire day off to sit with them and do math worksheets or science experiments.”

“All parents are in the same boat,” Logan said. “Your kid is not going to fall behind if they don’t do these assignments every day.”

Nevertheless, Vancouver, Washington, teacher Renee Collins has committed to keeping not only her own 10- and 8-year-old children on track academically, but two of her friend’s children and a second-grade neighbor as well.

“We’re going to do Monday, Tuesday and Thursday with the five kids together and the other days I’ll do individually with (her own kids). So we’ll do five days,” she said.

“The one thing that kind of gives a lot of us comfort,” said Collins who teaches middle-school math, “is that it’s not just our state. It’s our entire nation. It’s not just going to be the state of Washington that’s behind. It’s not just going to be my children that are going to be behind. It’s going to be everybody.”

protocol unless your property falls within a jurisdiction that is under temporary governmental changes to housing laws," the Newport Beach employee said in an email.

The firm encouraged tenants to apply for government assistance and reach out to charity organizations if they have lost income due to coronavirus.

"It is better to apply for assistance as soon as possible as the situation could possibly grow larger," the email said. "If you wait until rent is due, the assistance programs will not have enough time to process your request to help you make your rent payment on time."

Scott Pastel, vice president of property management and real estate at Marshall Reddick, said the firm's CEO has personally reached out to each tenant to clarify and apologize for the emails.

"The letter … is not in line with the heart of our company and who we are," Pastel said in an email. "We understand during these unprecedented times everyone is experiencing unique and unexpected hardship. We are committed to supporting our tenants and landlords during this time."

COVID-19 cases increase in Santa Monica

Five people living in Santa Monica have tested positive for coronavirus.

Officials announced 59 new cases of coronavirus on Saturday, three of which were in Santa Monica. The total number of confirmed cases in L.A. County reached 351. Across the state, 1,521 people have tested positive for coronavirus and 27 have died, although L.A. County Department of Public Health Director Barbara Ferrer has said the number of people carrying the virus is likely much higher due to testing limitations.

Two more County residents died after contracting COVID-19, for a total of four deaths countywide, officials said. The two individuals were older than 65 with underlying health conditions.

On Friday, Santa Monica had two people who tested positive for coronavirus. By Saturday, that number had risen to five. Additionally, six people in Venice and 18 people in Brentwood were diagnosed with the virus.

Santa Monica College, which enrolls about 30,000 students, said Thursday night that a student had tested positive for the virus and three employees at Bergamot area office parks tested positive last weekend. It is unknown if the SMC and Bergamot cases are Santa Monica residents and therefore count toward the city's total.

TODAY'S BIRTHDAY (MARCH 23)

The buck in the woods grows a crown of antlers, but that alone doesn't make him king. The endowment is merely a chance to fight for the right to rule. You've such an attribute -- an impressive talent that will be put to the test to prove it's more than an adornment. You'll use your gifts to claim territory and lead your life. Libra and Leo adore you. Your lucky numbers are: 10, 40, 50, 18 and 47.

ARIES (March 21-April 19). The muses will favor you with practical solutions. You'll be inspired, not to paint a picture or sing a song but to find the most elegant solution to an everyday problem.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20). Knowing what's going to happen doesn't make the future conceivable. Life can be explained, considered, talked about until faces go blue, but it's only lived one way, and that is through the experience.

GEMINI (May 21-June 21). When you love your own camaraderie, you're never at a loss for good company. People will want to be near you today, which fortunately shouldn't interfere with cherished solo time.

CANCER (June 22-July 22). You'll be a leader. Your ability to navigate the territory will be envied by those who don't have nearly the same confidence level in a place as you do.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22). Empathy is at the heart of all you do today, and behind the things you don't do. You'll ignore the mistakes of others and overlook their shortcomings in order to praise strengths.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22). You're looking forward to something pleasant but trying not to set your expectation too high, as that would surely diminish the moment when it arrives. Happiness is mastering the art of expectation.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 23). Anyone who has told a lie (in other words, just about everyone who speaks a language) knows something about the subtle differences between lies and truths. You'll get a lesson in this today.

SCORPIO (Oct. 24-Nov. 21). Someone will be intent on impressing you. Unfortunately for them, you are not easily impressed, and your reserve will only make this person try harder.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21). You might be able to put on your old clothes. Even so, when you do, you're somehow not wearing them. Same goes for your old obsessions. You can go back, but when you get there, you're never there.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19). The thing you are trying to do will continue to be a pain, but you shouldn't let that stop you from doing it anyway. This is important, or you wouldn't be so frustrated. Keep going at it from different angles.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18). You really don't feel compelled to run your ideas by other people for approval, but you should anyway. It's not because you'll change your mind but because you'll learn from your presentation.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20). There's an endeavor that you'd do even if you weren't paid. You'd wake up early or stay up late to do it. If it were suddenly made illegal tomorrow, you'd risk it in secret. That's what you should spend the bulk of your time on.

customers, because 95% of business at Great White is a direct result of dine-in eating.

With summer around the corner, Trude explained how he and his 35 staff members were previously discussing how to celebrate the cafe's expansion in April.

"We're taking the space next door to us so we've been in construction there for about seven to eight months," Trude said. "So, you know, this time two weeks ago, we were planning a grand opening and a big launch event and discussing how to hire more people, summer hours and really gearing up for all of that."

But now everything is on hold, according to Trude, who said, "We were basically blindsided by this. We had to stop our construction, let all of those guys go and then just go into disaster-recovery mode on the existing restaurant."

As a result, Trude was scrambling this last week to sign up for various delivery apps, which was a common scene for many business owners in recent days.

When Surfer Rose opened in February on Wilshire Boulevard, owner Ivan Torres hoped to lure in patrons by touting beer, bite size bar offerings and other delicious eats, but the recent restrictions on public dining have now forced Torres, his staff and many of their peers in the area to offer strictly take-out options.

It's been hard communicating the changes to customers, according to Trude, but once patrons learn that places like Great White are still open, they are usually more than eager to ride a bike down to Pacific Avenue to enjoy the cafe's atmosphere and recently refreshed menu.

"I think it's been a good reprieve for people. We've been hearing a lot of: 'I've been stuck at home and want an excuse to get out in a safe way,' and I think we provide that normalcy people want," Trude said as he described how local patrons are also helping businesses retain their employees by shopping during the pandemic.

Some businesses on Abbot Kinney have opted to close for now, "but we're lucky to have a strong following who will come three to four times a week. And I feel for those businesses that maybe don't have that strong community following because I see them really struggling," Trude said. "You have to take it day by day, and that's what we're all trying to do. We don't know how long we'll be in this so we've been really creative, trying out soups, whole roasted chickens," and a number of other items like the Happiness Hampers.

It's an adjustment, "but we have to get creative right now," Trude said, which is a sentiment shared by many, including "The Beauty Alchemist" Shannon Tackett.

"I didn't really think too much about the slowdown a couple of weeks ago because my business does tend to ebb and flow," Tackett said in an interview Thursday. "But this week, it's all I've noticed."

Having recently contemplated working out of her home, which would allow her to save the $315 she pays weekly to rent a chair at a local salon, Tackett decided to make the change this week and is now offering house calls and services in her own home.

"I was already starting to calculate numbers, and then this happened," Tackett said while detailing how she lost more than $500 this week due to cancellations. "So at that point, I just made the hard decision and am in the process of creating a beautiful outdoor sanctuary and salon complete with ocean view, sunset cocktail haircuts and aromatherapy massages."

Like Trude and the Great White staff, Tackett is currently trying to market to the masses and hopes she will soon be able to get back to business as usual.

"I'm currently having everybody contact me on my phone 310-745-9773 and we're setting up appointments either at my place or theirs," Tackett said, mentioning she wears gloves and provides masks during every consultation.

"We have to be really creative right now," Trude added, which is very hard considering how much is unknown right now. "But people want to help, and that's the amazing thing. They can support by just helping to keep some revenue coming in so stores don't go under."

SENIORS

Monica Community Helpers (https://www.santamonicahelpers.org). And I want to say that I think that word 'community' is super important because that is a core idea to the mission statement, which is to bring a group of people around Santa Monica together to make a difference," Camarena said. "I think we're so much more powerful together and that's really the basis of this organization."

The goal of the helpers, according to Camarena, is to assemble a task force of volunteers across Santa Monica who will deliver groceries, medication, toiletries, and anything else that locals who are seniors or ill may need.

"And the goal or the measure of success — to put it bluntly — is to prevent a death in our community by running these errands and reducing the time that those who are at risk are spending in the outside world," Camarena said.

"If they can stay home, if they can quarantine to protect themselves and we can help them do that, then I think the effects of that can be huge," she added. "Because just from talking to seniors this week, a lot of them are not really clear on what this means; some of them think that they can still go out and take a bus somewhere."

So education is certainly a challenge, according to Camarena, but that's far from the only roadblock.

In the last week, Camarena has created the organization's website and accompanying GoFundMe page (https://www.gofundme.com/f/santa-monica-community-helpers), "but I am looking to the community to help with the rest," she said. "And that doesn't just mean nonprofits, which I am speaking to already. It also includes companies that are also a part of this community — part of silicon beach — because I think we have a responsibility to help those who are in this with us."

While making a delivery on Tuesday, "I was at the grocery store and I got a phone call from a man who said that he wanted to help and he was trying to do something similar in Venice, and he wanted to partner," Camarena said, mentioning how she has been looking for a way to handle the hundreds of calls she will soon be receiving if her plan comes to fruition. "He said, 'Wow! I'm actually calling you because me and my business partner have spent the last month working on this technology that actually allows us to create a hotline. We'd love to know what you think and if you want to partner with us, we would love to make it happen.'

"I tried the hotline last night, and I laughed and shed a tear at the same time because it was literally exactly what I needed," Camarena said. Anybody can call 323-310-0411 to get connected and it will ask for your zip code and get you started with the process.

"We only set it up on Saturday so we are starting in Santa Monica," but the goal is to expand depending on the need and number of volunteers, Camarena said. "And we're definitely open to others reaching out to us and starting this in their own local communities."

As a daughter of parents who are above the age of 60 and live in San Francisco, it's hard not being close by to help her family, Camarena said, "but since I'm not there, I want to help my surrounding community and my neighbors and make sure they're okay and they're protected… I have not slept more than three hours over the weekend and it's one of those things I never thought I was going to do, but I felt it in my heart and I really wanted to help."
