City Council makes moves to reduce number of vacant property violations

Scott Snowden

PROPERTY: For many years, 3004 Broadway was the poster property for vacant sites, but now it is finally being developed.

SCOTT SNOWDEN
SMDP Staff Writer

Vacant properties must be kept to minimal safety and cleanliness standards according to new rules passed by the City Council last week.

On Aug. 22, Council heard an introduction and first reading of ordinance that amends the Santa Monica Municipal Code with regards to property maintenance, vacant properties and reduction of nuisances. Moreover, City staff will return at an unspecified date to create a vacant property registration program that includes fees that serve to recover costs associated with the inspection and ongoing monitoring of vacant properties in the City of Santa Monica. This is irrespective of zoning and includes both residential and business properties.

Over the past few years, concern has risen regarding the number of properties that are vacant. Consequently, this has led to decrease in the perceived safety of residents and an unquestionable aesthetic blight in Santa Monica. The new legislation creates new property maintenance requirements and establishes maintenance and

The Santa Monica-Malibu Unified School District is used to fresh faces, welcoming new students into the district every August. For 2023-24, the fresh faces extend to the staff as well, with two new principals excited to make their mark on campus.

This year will be the first in the SMMUSD principal role for both Jose Cuevas and Dr. Amy Onyendu, taking the reins at Lincoln Middle School and Roosevelt Elementary School, respectively. Both enter their new offices with a wealth of educational experience, looking to

To district or not to district remains the question after most recent election ruling

MATTHEW HALL

Santa Monica may still lose the now further delayed case over the future of its elections but experts told the Daily Press last week that the outcome may not be what people expect given the recent ruling at the state Supreme Court opened the door for something other than districts to replace the current at-large system.

Risks for adding hydrogen energy to California gas systems are not worth the limited reward

From major blockbusters like the movie “Glass Onion” to actual hydrogen blending projects being proposed in several parts of California, hydrogen is on everyone’s minds.

Hydrogen is touted as a panacea for meeting increasing energy demand and fixing the climate crisis. However, a hydrogen economy would involve serious risks, especially when transporting hydrogen through pipelines in close proximity to people. And it may not actually help improve the climate crisis it’s been tapped to solve.

The 2021 Infrastructure Investment and Jobs Act set aside $9.5 billion for clean hydrogen, and the Inflation Reduction Act signed last year provided additional beneficial policies and incentives for the U.S. hydrogen industry. Pressure to replace or blend natural gas with hydrogen is being felt in many states, however it seems California may be feeling it the most.

Over the last few years, utilities in California have proposed numerous projects to move hydrogen through different types of pipelines for a variety of uses. These include blending hydrogen into natural gas distribution systems (the pipes that deliver natural gas into homes and businesses) and building new pipeline systems intended to carry pure hydrogen over longer distances at higher pressure.

Several reports, including from the Pipeline Safety Trust and UC Riverside for the California Public Utilities Commission, have identified key problems with blending and transporting hydrogen through pipelines.

These projects are seriously concerning. Hydrogen is not natural gas. There are numerous physical and behavioral differences when comparing methane (the primary component in natural gas) to hydrogen. This is an important point to take home as states begin to toy with the idea of blending the two gases into notoriously leak-prone pipelines.

Hydrogen poses serious explosion

Association et al. v. City of Santa Monica case revolves around allegations that the city's at-large voting system unfairly discriminates against Latino voters and violates the California Voting Rights Act (CVRA). The plaintiffs, including the Pico Neighborhood Association and Maria Loya, argue that adopting district-based voting would address this perceived bias. The legal proceedings began in 2016, with the first ruling emerging in 2018 from the Los Angeles Superior Court, favoring the plaintiffs and criticizing the at-large voting approach. However, a 2020 appeals court decision overturned this ruling, leading the plaintiffs to elevate the case to the California Supreme Court.

At the heart of the appeal was the notion of "voter dilution," which examines whether the current voting system marginalizes protected groups, like racial minorities, by limiting their impact due to their smaller population representation. The California Supreme Court dismissed claims that an alternative system must mandate a "near majority" percentage of voters but acknowledged that the City's current system isn't inherently unlawful under the CVRA. Instead, they returned the case to the Court of Appeal for reconsideration.

The Supreme Court also emphasized that the plaintiffs have the responsibility of demonstrating that alternative election systems genuinely enhance a protected class's ability to influence outcomes, regardless of whether these systems involve districts or other methods.

Harvard Law professor Nicholas Stephanopoulos said the decision was a model for state voting rights acts in other states.

He said the ruling had two foundations: that racially polarized voting alone is not enough to alter an election system and that a better system must be identified by the plaintiff.

Election experts said voting is considered polarized when the preferences of the majority and minority-race voters diverge substantially and when the racial majority votes with enough cohesion to usually defeat the minority's candidates of choice.

"Racially polarized voting is very common in American elections, so if this were all that had to be shown, few electoral systems would be safe from plausible challenges," he said in a written analysis. "Additionally, the existence of racially polarized voting doesn't necessarily mean that some other system would improve minority representation. If a minority group couldn't secure more representation under any other system, it's a stretch to say its vote is diluted under the status quo."

He said the acknowledgment that district voting wasn't the only solution was also laudable.

"In particular, a plaintiff can put forward a system of proportional representation using cumulative, limited, or ranked-choice voting," he said. "A couple California cities have recently switched from at-large elections to systems of proportional representation after being threatened with CVRA lawsuits. These systems promise better minority representation than single-member districts along with fewer policymaking pathologies. It's wonderful news that the court explicitly recognized these systems as viable alternatives to the status quo. Hopefully this will encourage more CVRA litigants to consider these systems as remedies when violations are found."

Christopher S. Elmendorf with the UC Davis school of law was less enthusiastic about the possibility for non-district solutions to CVRA complaints.

"I think it's a very reasonable interpretation of the California Voting Rights Act," he said of the ruling. "I also think the California Voting Rights Act is weird in a very fundamental way that the court didn't address. And the weirdness of the California Voting Rights Act is that it only applies to at-large elections."

He said the ruling's elaborate discussion of alternative electoral systems didn't recognize the reality of the situation, that according to the law, districts are immune from lawsuits and are therefore the most heavily incentivized solution. That's a problem according to Elmendorf because districts can be just as damaging to minority votes.

"Any city that wants a 100% guarantee of no litigation, no legal liability, no risk, under the California Voting Rights Act, just has to adopt single member district elections," he said. "And then they can gerrymander their districts however they want and they won't ever be found liable for diluting minority voting power, at least under the CVRA. They might face a federal complaint. So it's just a really strange statute in that way, to create an unbelievably powerful incentive for cities to adopt single member district elections, regardless of whether those elections are good or bad for minority voters."

He said the ruling does show how flexible the CVRA can be in providing ways to challenge at-large elections but the potential remedies are not always better than the problem.

"... the CVRA creates a strange asymmetry between at large elections and single member district elections," he said. "The first being subject to challenge, the second not being subjected to challenge and because of this asymmetry, the CVRA will not predictably result in better outcomes for minorities, it will just result in the elimination of at large voting systems."

He said there's evidence that single-member districts have unintended consequences on the way a city operates.

"Housing production is a major problem. The state is struggling with housing, homelessness and territorially organized local government representation is poison for housing production," he said.

According to Elmendorf pension problems have gotten worse in districted cities and the overall quality of candidates may decline.

"So there are real problems with having single member district elections as the norm for local government representation," he said. "And for the California Voting Rights Act to say, essentially single member district elections are so good that you get a free pass against vote dilution liability if you adopt them doesn't make any sense given the actual problem that California is dealing with statewide."

Non-district remedies do exist in other places and former Santa Monica Mayor Mike Feinstein has long proposed moving from the current voting system to a ranked choice method (voters rank candidates by preference and if no one wins based on first-preferences, the lowest vote getter is eliminated and votes are automatically redistributed until a winner is declared).

"The problem I see with the implementation of the CVRA law regarding opportunity districts is that it requires courts to do a massive speculative deep dive to get into theoretical guesses about what could have happened under a different electoral system where the protected class could not be close to a majority in a hypothetical single-seat, winner-take-all district," he said.

Following the recent verdict, UCLA law professor Richard L. Hasen said it appears CVRA cases are going to be harder to bring to court than plaintiffs would want but may be easier to win than cases under the federal standard.

"As to what happens in Santa Monica ultimately, it is too early to say. But the potential for getting rid of the city's at-large system still seems like a real possibility," he said.

Florida man Arrested for Failed Theft of a $40,000 Rolex

The Santa Monica Police Department has arrested an individual after a failed attempt to steal a $40,000 Rolex.

On Monday, August 21, 2023, the Santa Monica Police Department (SMPD) responded to the Rolex store located at 159 Santa Monica Place for a robbery in progress. During the robbery, multiple employees activated emergency alarms, triggering a police response. While officers were enroute, City of Santa Monica Dispatchers relayed that onsite security were attempting to detain the combative suspect. Upon arrival, SMPD officers quickly took Terrence Allen into custody. During the investigation, officers learned that Allen entered the store, requested to view a watch valued at $40,000 and once in hand, he attempted to flee. Allen immediately encountered armed security stationed outside and after a brief struggle the property was recovered.

TERRENCE ALLEN

Terrence Allen, a 26-years-old male from Florida, was booked into the Santa Monica Jail and later charged by the Los Angeles District Attorney with armed robbery (211PC) and Grand Theft (487PC). Bail was set at $125,000. Allen was also found to be wanted for a robbery out of the state of Georgia.

Anyone with any additional information pertaining to this incident or subject is encouraged to contact Detective I. Tavera in the Criminal Investigations Division at 310-458-8451, or the Santa Monica Police Department's Watch Commander (24 hours) at 310-458-8426.

Utility prices

Editor:

My household expenses keep getting higher, and here comes PG&E, SCE, and SDG&E wanting to force me to pay the highest utility tax in the nation. They're taking corporate greed to the next level, knowing full well that we are forced to use their services and they can apparently do and charge whatever they want. Why did the legislature and Gavin Newsom vote to let them do this?

This deceptive utility tax doesn't just hurt our pocket books–it hurts the environment. It turns California's long commitment to energy conservation on its head. The utility tax proposal takes away consumer incentives to conserve energy and to seek cheaper and cleaner alternatives to the grid. That makes no sense and is a giant step backwards on climate justice.

I am writing to you today to put a spotlight on this issue. The public deserves to know what is happening behind closed doors, so that we can band together and stop this outrageous utility tax, that will increase bills for millions of hard working Californians. We URGENTLY need public awareness on this issue so that the legislature can REPEAL this utility tax and stop letting utilities get away with whatever they want.

risks due to its high flammability range, likeliness to leak, and ability to cause embrittlement and cracking within the pipeline. Hydrogen is the smallest and lightest molecule in the universe, making leakage from already leak-prone pipeline infrastructure potentially more likely.

Aside from safety issues, leakage is also an important consideration when thinking about this issue from a climate perspective. Hydrogen by itself is a potent indirect greenhouse gas estimated to have 30 times the warming power of carbon dioxide in the first 20 years. Hydrogen's energy density by volume is also much lower than methane, meaning that more hydrogen must be delivered to receive the same energy output if hydrogen is blended into natural gas.

For example, even blending 10% green hydrogen into natural gas pipelines would only reduce emissions by about 3%. Accounting for leaks would further diminish these already slim climate benefits.

Before California proceeds with these new hydrogen pipeline projects, policymakers need to do their homework. Any use of hydrogen in gas distribution systems poses a risk to California communities that is too great to justify with limited and questionable climate benefits.

State leaders are divided over the role hydrogen will play in the energy transition over the next two decades. California's lack of hydrogen fuel infrastructure is restricting its ability to become a legitimate alternative, argues a fuel cell electric vehicle owner.

California needs every transportation option to meet climate goals – including hydrogen

Re: "Hardly anyone owns a hydrogen car. California may pay up to $300 million for fuel stations anyway"

I drive a hydrogen fuel cell electric vehicle. The car is great, but there are not enough fueling stations – yet – to make this a viable option for many people.

California subsidized battery and hybrid EVs for decades. It took that long (and more than $5 per gallon gasoline) to make them a viable alternative for some drivers, but they are still not the best option for everyone. Range and charging times for electric vehicles have improved, but are still not as good as my Hyundai Nexo.

I can fill my car in minutes and leave with 375 miles in range. That is far preferable for people who drive a lot or live in apartment buildings where it is hard to install EV chargers.

And hydrogen can be carbon neutral. A system recently installed at the port of Long Beach uses landfill gas to make hydrogen, emitting less carbon than burning the gas and producing enough hydrogen to fill 240 fuel cell EVs per day.

Excess wind and solar energy can also be used to separate hydrogen from water with virtually no carbon output.

We need more transportation options to support California's climate goals, not fewer. Hydrogen for personal vehicles should be part of the solution and California should continue making strategic investments in hydrogen until the chicken-or-egg dilemma is past us – as it has done with many other new energy technologies.

State leaders are divided over the role hydrogen will play in the energy transition over the next two decades. Proposed hydrogen blending projects that would transport hydrogen using natural gas pipelines are not worth the safety risk or emissions creation, says a policy advocate.

shift their focus to their new co-workers and SMMUSD students.

Cuevas has been an educator for 17 years, beginning as a teacher in south Los Angeles before moving into administration in the area. He served as an assistant principal in the Baldwin Park Unified School District, eventually moving to SMMUSD last school year to serve as O-House Principal at Santa Monica High School. Cuevas' dedication to education comes from his youth, as well as a chance to shape the pathway students take from Lincoln to Samohi and beyond.

"There were many educators who impacted my life, and I saw the fruits of their labor," Cuevas said. "More importantly, I love working with children. I think empowering them, giving them a sense of belonging is important. (Education) gave me an identity, it allowed me to be successful in finding direction ... to have that ability to do the same with our kids, that's all I could ask for."

Dr. Onyendu enters SMMUSD as a whole and her job at Roosevelt with more than 14 years of experience, most recently serving as the Director of Admissions and Attendance and Assistant Principal for Palisades Charter High School. She has held positions in both primary school and university education, working in various capacities for a district in Mesquite, Texas, and working as a Lecturer for the College of Education at Western State Colorado University.

Like Cuevas, her history serves as a blueprint for what she wants to bring at Roosevelt, particularly in the areas of equity and academically engaging learning experiences.

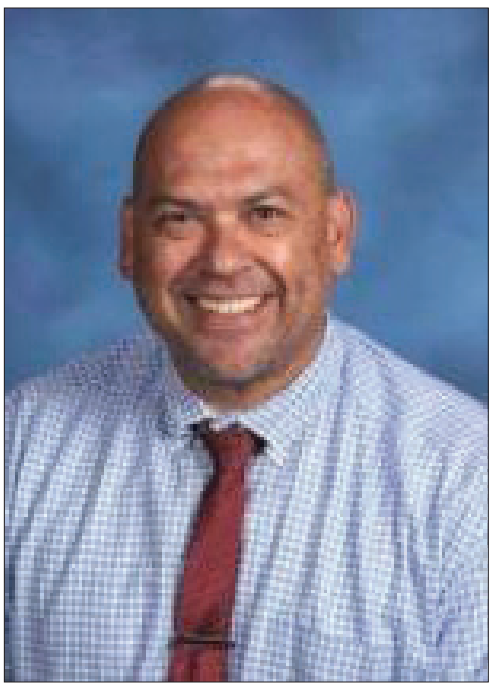

"I am immensely grateful for the opportunity to serve both the district of Santa Monica-Malibu Unified and the community of Roosevelt Elementary," Dr. Onyendu said. "I look forward to immersing myself in the culture and collaboratively working with staff, parents, guardians, and the community to provide our students with an educational landscape that nurtures their talents, celebrates their boundless creativity, values their voices, and fosters their growth, all while instilling the power of education."

> "We want to continue to provide opportunities for our students to connect with school, get them an identity and a sense of belonging"
> - Jose Cuevas

Academic and extracurricular equity and inclusion is always on the mind of Cuevas, who will be part of the district's first year of a middle school athletics pilot program. Lincoln recently held tryouts for programs in co-ed flag football, girls volleyball and co-ed cross country, with 160 Lincoln students signing up for the tryouts.

"We want to continue to provide opportunities for our students to connect with school, get them an identity and a sense of belonging," Cuevas said. "This was developed to give them that identity, that sense of belonging. When students are connected to school, they're more successful, it empowers them."

security standards for vacant properties.

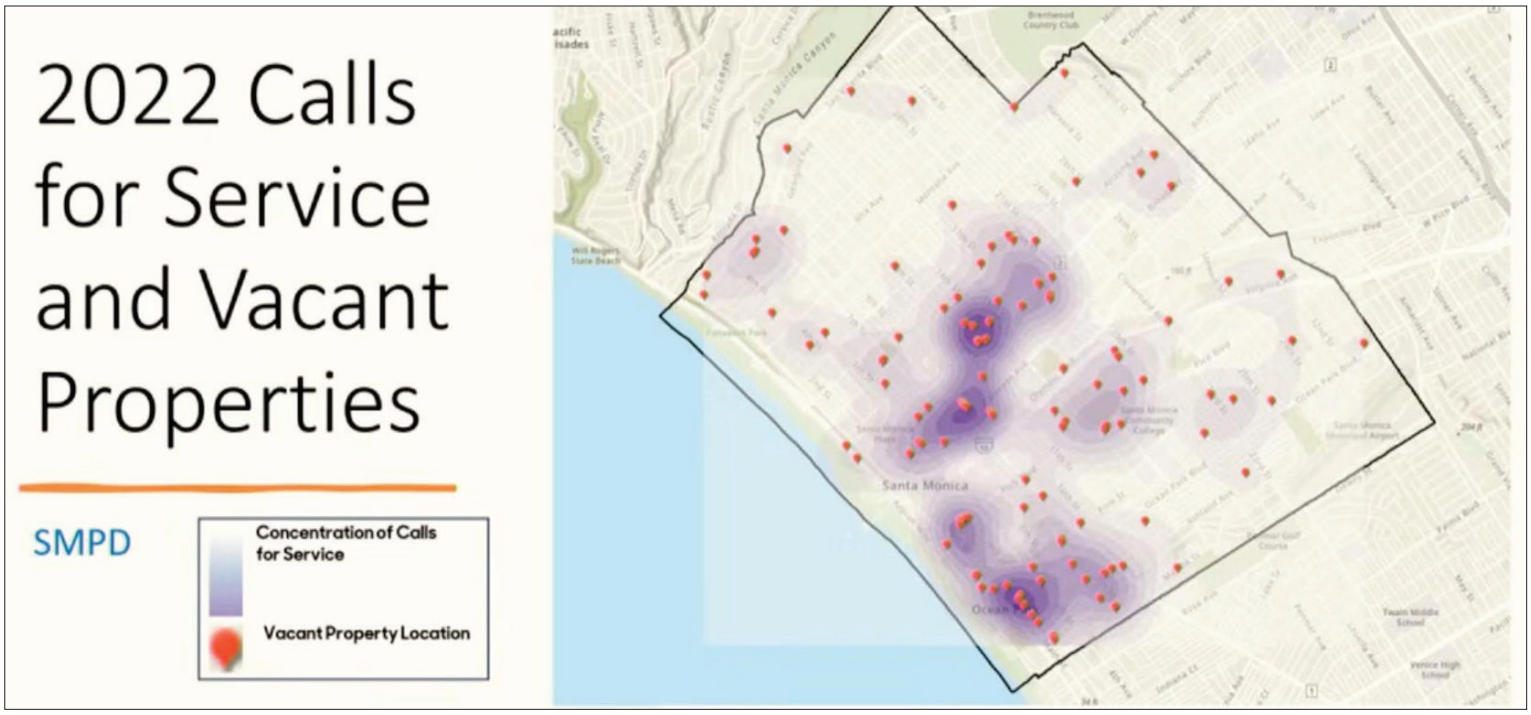

These requirements would be located in a new Article 13, which would also include the public nuisance standards, currently found in Chapter 8.96. These new tools will enable Code Enforcement staff to better respond to the needs of the community and improve the look and safety of the community.

In an extremely insightful and concise presentation, Daniel Mick, Code Enforcement Manager at City of Santa Monica, showed how the concentration of calls for service to the Police Department from January to November of 2022 related to the location of vacant properties. At which point there were audible gasps from Councilmembers as the evidence of a connection was clear.

"You see, there seems to be a really strong correlation between calls for service and the location of vacant properties," Mick said.

Going forward, all vacant properties will be required to adhere to certain maintenance standards including, clean and weed free, proper groundcover, all hedges no higher than 42 inches or 3½ feet, pest/rodent free, window coverings removed and personal items removed from interior. A new fine and citation structure will also be introduced.

In addition, all vacant properties may be required to meet certain security standards including, installation of fencing (no temporary chain-link fences), polycarbonate boarding, combination lock on gates, "no trespassing" signs, trespass arrest authorization, motion-activated video and lighting and documentation of security measures.

Santa Monica City Council

PROBLEMS: Data collected by the Code Enforcement Manager clearly shows a correlation between vacant properties and police department calls of service.

There was some attempt at clarification of "nuisance" and Douglas Sloan, City Attorney, offered, "There are literally hundreds, if not thousands of types of nuisances. This is just a portion of those. So a nuisance is basically the use of property that unreasonably interferes with the use and enjoyment of another's property, like playing your stereo too loud can be a nuisance."

"Back in 2016, council did give staff direction to come back with a vacant property ordinance. Something was provided it wasn't super strong. But it did provide minimum security and protection requirements for properties," Mick said.

According to the staff report, approximately 130 known or suspected vacant properties in the city have been informally observed. For purposes of surveying the city, properties were considered substantially vacant if it is believed that fewer than half of the units in the building were occupied. The volume of complaints concerning vacant properties has also consistently increased, with 11 received in 2021, 31 received in 2022 and 37 received in the first half of 2023.

"It does sound like we have identified it at least potentially, the vacant properties within the city," remarked Mayor Gleam Davis, "Do you intend to be proactive with those particular properties?"

To which Mick answered, "Absolutely."

The item was moved by Mayor Pro Tempore Lana Negrete and seconded by Councilmember Phil Brock with no amendments and passed unanimously 6-0 as Councilmember Jesse Zwick was absent due to catching Covid.

TODAY'S BIRTHDAY (Aug. 28)

Welcome to the year of the heart. You shun societal programming to follow the beating in your chest, which talks to you in the rhythm of joy. You don't even need to be brave; love does all the work. More highlights: You're creative and industrious. You'll build what's useful: a strong relationship, a network of resources and the solution to a persistent problem. Leo and Scorpio adore you. Your lucky numbers are: 7, 40, 5, 1 and 17.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES (March 21-April 19). Growth is a natural and unconscious process... until it isn't. Then growth is a decision about who you are and how you're going to make it happen. You'll contemplate a conscious change.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20). This is one of those rare times when pushing your luck will be a good thing, so don't be afraid to rock the boat. The boat is stuck on a reef and must be rocked in order to get unstuck.

GEMINI (May 21-June 21). Today it's not what you know or who you know, it's how you present the knowledge. Less is more. Quiet confidence will convey a sense of power that helps people settle in and get down to work.

CANCER (June 22-July 22). It's OK to be needy sometimes. Without need, there is no bond. Being helped shows us how to help. Vulnerability is the hollowness that allows us to resonate with one another.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22). The best games to take part in will be the ones that don't offer a winning trophy. With no reward at the end, you can really connect with the feeling of simply being able, active and in the flow of life.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22). It's not that there are no stupid questions. There are, in fact, very stupid questions, and yet even those may take you to a new vantage from which to see the problem. Each and every different point of view informs the big picture.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 23). You don't need to pay to learn, at least not with dollars. Pay with your time and with the awkwardness you feel trying something new. The best education offers no grades. Instead, it gives you skills, knowledge and hopefully wisdom, too.

SCORPIO (Oct. 24-Nov. 21). In a weird way, things that are too easy become very hard. Tedium is laborious. Anticipate it and be ready to make things more interesting by adding a twist or an extra challenge.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21). New information will surprise and perhaps unsettle you, but don't worry. You don't have to change everything just because you now understand something you didn't before. The necessary adjustment will be very small, and you're adaptable!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19). You'd like to think you don't do anything without a reason, but now you're oddly drawn to an endeavor that's a little scary, moving forward without knowing why. Perhaps "because it scares me" is reason enough.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18). If you pass the unfinished business seven times a day and think a negative thought about it, that's seven negative thoughts darkening your mind. You'll handle your to-do list and then bask in mental sunshine — a well-deserved respite.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20). You're the blast of fresh excitement that enlivens the scene. You don't show up to have fun, you show up to BE fun. Because you bring your "A" game to socializing, you wind up getting invited to the A-list events.
