Stroke survivor powers toward education

BY MELODY HANATANI
Daily Press Staff Writer

WESTWOOD David Bellamy scanned the room in disbelief.

To the right sat a man in his 50s, the left another in his 80s, talking about sore backs, medications and the ails that come with being a member of the senior population.

It was all unrelatable to the youngest member of a stroke survivors' support group, especially to someone who suffered one at the age of 26.

"I thought there has to be young people who have had a stroke," he said.

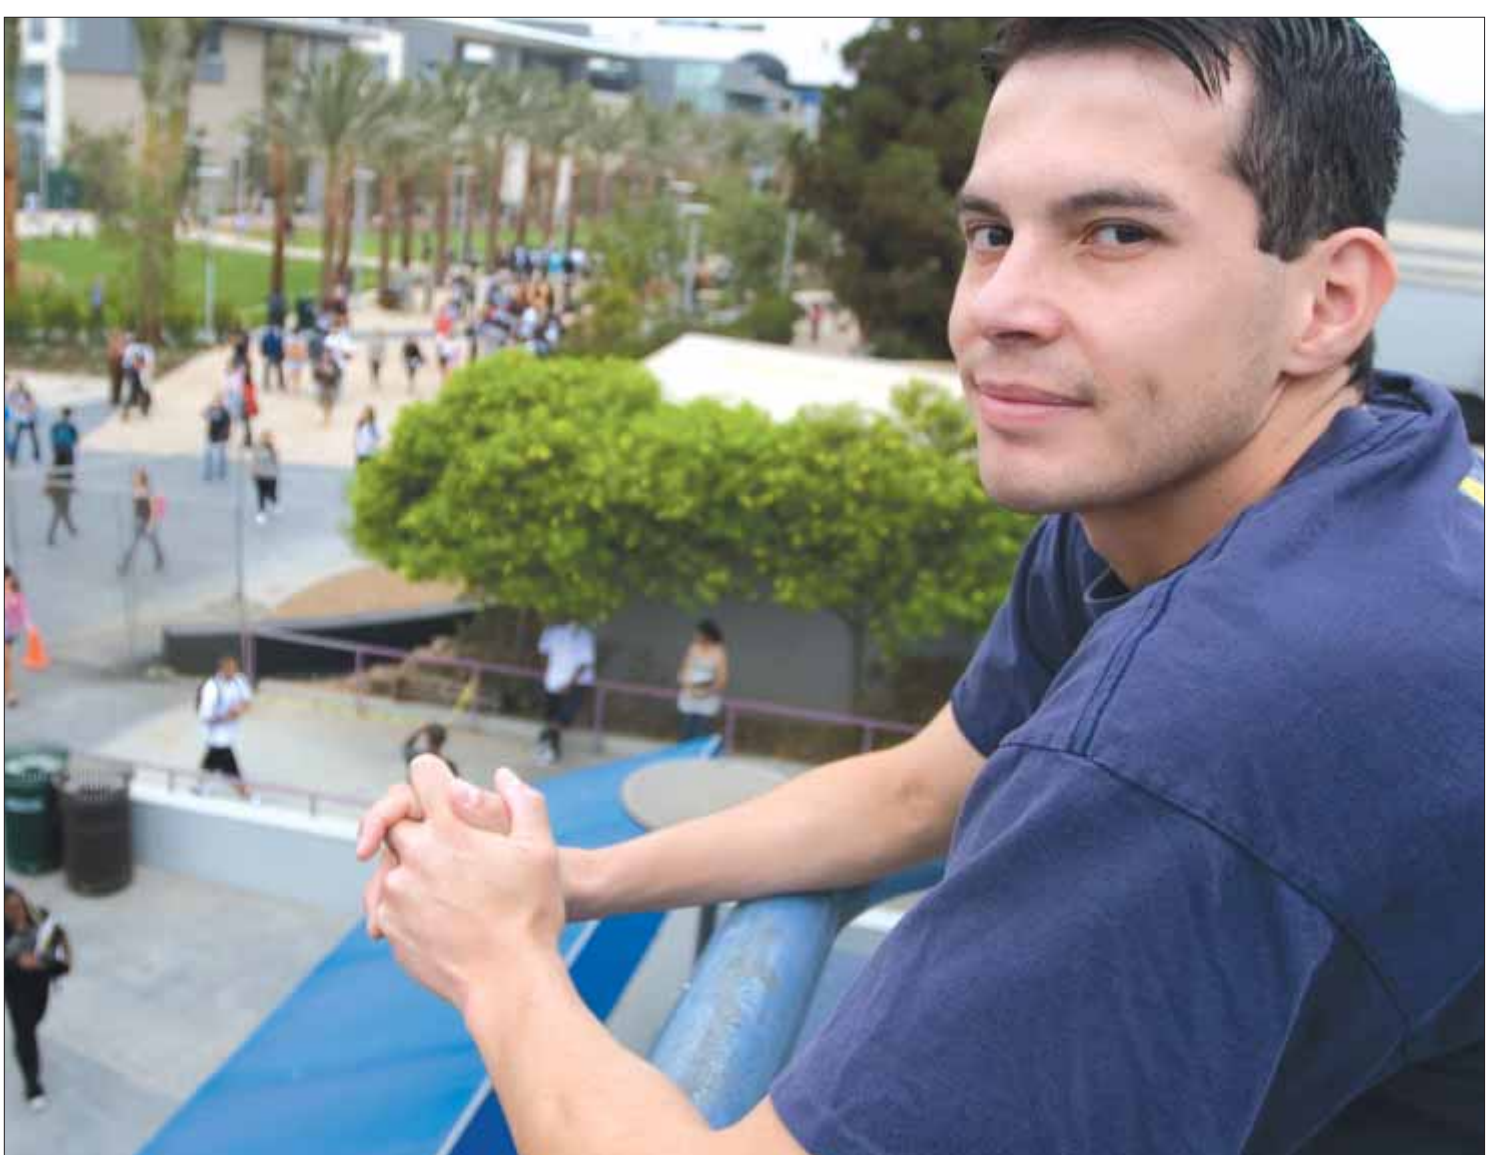

The meeting at the UCLA Medical Center in 2007 would be Bellamy's first and last as he set out to form a support group that would cater to those who had unexpectedly experienced a stroke in their prime.

It came just a few months later at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center where with the help of Terri Lukomski, a certified therapeutic recreation specialist, Bellamy was able to launch the "One Stroke Ahead: Young Person's Stroke Support Group" in September.

Bellamy, who is studying pharmacy at Santa Monica College, clearly remembers the day when doctors told him he had a stroke. What he doesn't recall is experiencing the stroke itself.

The event happened in 2006 when Bellamy underwent a specialized brain test at UCLA Medical Center to locate the cause of an inordinate amount of epileptic seizures.

The Brentwood resident has had epilepsy his entire life and claims to have tried virtually every medication available on the mar-

Rehabilitation centers lend a hand to birds

BY STEPHANIE TAFT
Special to the Daily Press

SM BEACH It's been a hectic summer season for volunteers and members belonging to the International Bird Rescue Research Center and other groups in Southern California dedicated to helping the lives of endangered birds and other aquatic life.

The center, a nonprofit organization located in San Pedro and Fairfield, Calif., uses many tactics such as rehabilitation, research and training, to help mitigate human impact on any aquatic birds.

Hundreds of ill birds have been admitted for special care between both centers the past two months, coming from areas between Santa Barbara and Santa Monica, and even places as far away as Long Beach.

"We've been taking in a lot more birds from Santa Monica and all over L.A. county," Jay Holcomb, executive director of the center, said. "Thankfully it hasn't been because of recent oil spills."

Holcomb said that the centers were originally built for birds suffering from oil spills, but others are taken in, including birds tangled in fishing line, baby birds that have fallen from nests or have been abandoned, birds that have been hit my cars or injured by people, or birds that are just sick.

"We've been able to help more birds since more people are finding out about our centers," Holcomb added.

Julie King, rehabilitation manager at the center in San Pedro, explained the reasons for the recent influx in the number of birds rescued.

Mom posts unusual ad for live-in nanny

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK It was an unusually honest ad for a live-in nanny, beginning with the sentence, "My kids are a pain."

Maybe that's why it took on a life of its own, making the rounds of parenting blogs and e-mail inboxes and meriting an article in Thursday's New York Times. Rebecca Land Soodak, a 40-year-old painter and mother of four on Manhattan's Upper East Side, posted the ad on Craigslist on Aug. 19.

Some excerpts from the 1,000-word listing: "I can be a tad difficult to work for. I'm loud, pushy and while I used to think we paid well, I am no longer sure."

And this: "If you cannot multitask, or communicate without being passive aggressive, don't even bother replying."

And this: "If you are fundamentally unhappy with your life, you will be more unhappy if you take this job, so do us all a favor and get some treatment or move to the Rockies, but do not apply for employment with us. Also, if you suspect all wealthy women are frivolous, we are not for you. I do not want to hide my occasional Bergdorf shopping bag."

Ilana Laurence, a French teacher and mother of two, was one of many who was e-mailed the post by a friend and forwarded it, the paper said.

"I appreciated the way the woman put all her neuroses out there," she told the Times. "That's better than having it come out little by little after you've already hired somebody."

Soodak, whose husband owns a wine store in Manhattan, ended up selecting Christina Wynn, a 25-year-old University of Virginia graduate, for the job the paper said pays $430 a week and comes with free housing.

"I made a commitment to stay in the job for at least a year," Wynn, who has never before worked as a nanny, told the Times. "I met the oldest child, but not the others, which my mother said was crazy — to accept the job without meeting all the kids. So we'll see."

Back-to-school, but how?

Parents fear allowing children to ride the bus, walk

BY KAREN MATTHEWS

Associated Press Writer

As a child, Debbie Veney Robinson rode city buses to school starting in second grade. But when her 12-year-old daughter, Maya, starts eighth grade this fall, she'll be safely buckled in to the car for the ride to Catholic school.

Parents around the country are struggling to decide how their kids will get to school this fall — walk, ride a bike, take a bus or be driven by an adult — in a landscape they say has changed since they were kids.

Robinson, who lives in Washington, D.C., is among those who walked or rode public transportation when they were kids, but now drive their children to middle school or walk them to a bus stop half a block away.

"I do worry about children being abducted, because it happens," said Robinson. "I think the best choice is to protect them as long as you can."

Robinson said driving Maya to school gives her peace of mind, even if Maya would prefer to go alone.

"She and I do not see eye to eye on this," said Robinson, who works in public relations. "I'm pretty certain I've been called a hypocrite because of the way I was raised."

The question of when youngsters should travel without adult supervision is one of a range of issues confronting parents as children assert their independence. At what age should kids be left home alone? Own a cell phone? Go to a movie with friends?

For many parents, safety trumps independence. But some psychologists worry that kids who never escape the watchful eye of a parent or teacher won't develop the independence to negotiate their world.

Gregory Ramey, a child psychologist and a columnist for the Dayton Daily News in Ohio, said parents wondering whether a child is old enough to walk or bike to school should consider factors such as the child's maturity and whether the route to school involves busy streets.

"There's no certain age," he said. "It depends upon the child and it depends upon the neighborhood."

Ramey said that where he lives in suburban Oakwood, Ohio, children typically start walking to school with an older sibling at around the third grade and on their own by the fifth or sixth grade.

But despite years spent counseling families on issues relating to children's autonomy, Ramey said he and his wife had not decided whether to accompany their own 10-year-old, Samantha, on the five-block walk to school this year.

"We're working it through," he said.

Many experts say parents' fears of abduction are overblown, a result of intensive media coverage of cases like the disappearance of Madeleine McCann, the British girl who vanished while on vacation with her parents in Portugal last year.

According to the U.S. Department of Justice, about 100 American children are kidnapped by strangers a year, a tiny number compared with runaways and children snatched by a parent involved in a custody dispute.

The federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has a program to encourage children to walk to school for exercise, though not necessarily without an adult.

"One of the fears that parents expressed

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dispatch needs to be reviewed Editor:

Fire Chief Jim Hone just doesn't get it. More than a year and a half ago, he and his cohort in incompetence, Deputy Fire Chief Bruce Davis, outsourced fire dispatch operations to the behemoth and beleaguered LA City Fire Department (OCD). The fact that Santa Monica Fire Dispatchers were well known for providing exemplary service to the community did not stop Hone and Davis from their grave decision. In response to complaints against OCD, Davis showed his (and apparently Hone's) true colors when he told the Daily Press, "Either way we're still financially ahead of what we would have been." (SMDP May 28, 2008).

I argue that saving a few dollars is not as important as safeguarding the lives and property SMFD members are sworn to protect. Since the transition, response times have increased and many serious mistakes have been made. Susan Hartley wrote in her letter to the editor (SMDP June 12, 2008) about a fire reported in an alley and the mis-dispatch that resulted in no fire department response.

City Council made clear their dismay with the level of service OCD has been providing at the May 21 council meeting. Councilman Genser said, "I think it's time we just moved on, moved on in a deliberative and thoughtful way, but I think we need to move on." Councilman McKeown said, "I've heard enough information at this point, some of which might be anecdotal, but I think has been widely consistent that there is confusion.

There are things that are happening now with this regional dispatch that never happened when we handled it locally as far as a lack of specific knowledge of our city. I think we as a council owe to our city and to our firefighters to get back to that level of excellence enjoyed before."

Hone should know that the only serious and smart move would be to bring fire dispatch back and run it locally. The city spent tens of millions of dollars building the Public Safety Facility for police and fire dispatches only to see Hone outsource this highly critical step in the public safety process to the overworked and understaffed OCD. Furthermore, City Council made their intent clear in the May 22 meeting only to be ignored by Hone.

OCD recently received a 911 call from an elderly female. The woman complained of blood in her stool and stated that she felt like she was going to die. However, the Los Angeles dispatcher must have been distracted because he dispatched the call as a person being stabbed. Santa Monica paramedic Engine 5 was dispatched along with two police units.

When it was determined by Engine 5 that the call was strictly medical in nature and no stabbing had occurred, Engine 5's members were not happy. It is imperative for excellent patient care that responding units know the general nature of the emergency to which they are enroute. The captain and engineer on Engine 5 filed a written complaint with fire administration. However, I have been told by several Santa Monica firefighters that complaints are not taken seriously.

I suggest the council look closely at Hone's performance since becoming chief. Hone showed a considerable lack of judgment when he decided to outsource fire dispatch services.

Several firefighters have told me that morale within the department is at its lowest level. This is not the fire department residents and visitors of the city require. Immediate improvement in 911 services must occur. I urge community members to contact their city council representatives and share their views.

The candidates in their own write

BALLOT STATEMENTS FROM CITY Council and school board candidates are on City Hall's Web site. They're a fun read while waiting for Labor Day burgers to grill. First up, City Council.

Challenger Susan Hartley, an employment law attorney, lists a number of city problems and suggests she'll "fight for less growth, density, height and traffic and more tree canopy preservation and enhancement." She'll "also fight to clean our beaches and (eliminate?) airport pollution."

Businessman Michael Kovac is "for renters' rights, reducing traffic, fighting airport expansion, improving parking, promoting sustainable development and finding an effective solution concerning the homeless."

Writer Ted Winterer promises "to fight traffic, limit growth and promote adaptive use." He supports increased funding for schools, supports rent control and embraces sustainability. Winterer is "running to save our city from over development and preserve its diverse beach town character... ." He pledges to be the residents' voice.

On the other hand, physical therapist Linda Piera-Avila's priorities are community gardens and parks, a healthy environment/sustainable living, limited development, increasing bicycle ridership, an urban forest commission, tenant protection, affordable housing, publicly-assisted child care, election reform and on and on.

Entrepreneur and actor John Blakely suggests hybrid city buses, a solar power infrastructure, more bicycle parking, a community plan for a high magnitude earthquake (Hey John, it exists. Try Paul Weinberg, Fire Department's Emergency Services Coordinator) and "reducing homelessness by helping those who want it and protecting Santa Monica from those who don't."

Despite failing to mitigate problems such as homelessness, traffic, parking and development while on the dais, all four incumbents are running.

Twenty year Councilmember Ken Genser promises to control growth and fight overdevelopment; protect our safety; deliver cost-effective, high quality city services; support our schools; expand our park system; provide services for seniors and youth; ensure tenant protections; enhance affordable housing and manage city finances wisely.

Councilmember Richard Bloom is proud of his "nearly a decade" on the City Council. He boasts he's "answered your challenge to implement Santa Monica's world recognized environmental record," and "schools that are second to none." Bloom says he's "responded to our community's desire to end homelessness. He promises outstanding new parks and to create an exciting new cultural arts program, to complete Civic Center Park and bring more music and art to our Civic Auditorium — all while keeping Santa Monica safe and maintaining responsible fiscal policies. How about development, Richard?

Mayor/Architect Herb Katz lists his accomplishments after 16 years on the dais. He's "strongly supported the police and fire departments; co-founded the Third Street Promenade; fought for a sign ordinance to reduce urban blight; orchestrated the purchase of Virginia Park; helped bring in-ground crosswalk lighting to Santa Monica" (Crosswalk lighting?) and is a tireless advocate for airport safety. He calls himself "an independent voice of reason on the Council" and "will always fight to protect our quality of life." Forgot development too, Herb?

Last, but not least, is businessman/Councilmember Bobby Shriver, who's seeking his second term. His ballot statement oozes passion. Bobby takes on the West L.A. Veteran's Administration for foot dragging on providing critically needed housing for homeless vets. Shriver says it's also "unacceptable" that our beach water is loaded with fecal material and he wants to limit building heights and density. Go, Bobby!

Most school board incumbents glossed over recent district disasters by implying that they've fixed them, not prolonged or ignored them.

School board member Maria Leon-Vazquez says that under her eight years on the school board "Test scores increased; the budget was brought under fiscal control with high reserves," among other accomplishments. Budget under fiscal control? High reserves? Really?

Even more amazing is school board Vice President Jose Escarce, who in eight years on the board has "helped steer our school district through California's budget crisis while fostering educational excellence, equity, and (get this) financial accountability." Escarce promises to reform special education, strengthen intervention programs, promote teachers' professional development and efficiently manage Measure BB construction.

Architect Ralph Mechur says he'll insure the hiring of a highly qualified superintendent; support a comprehensive review of special education; successfully re-negotiate the facilities use contract with the city; make the district a leader in sustainable practices; support teachers, staff and "programs that raise achievement levels of all student (sic)."

Challengers include high school teacher Chris Bley, who promises to increase school board accessibility through bi-monthly neighborhood meetings (novel idea), provide appropriate "individualized" education, reduce classroom size and improve pay, support low achieving schools and eliminate the achievement gap.

Former UC Student Regent Ben Allen pledges to address the persistent achievement gap (the one the incumbents have narrowed?), recruit a superintendent of the highest caliber, emphasize academic excellence, pursue fiscal responsibility, improve special education and expand partnerships with SMC, UCLA, and beyond. But his "encouraging healthier eating and exercise" goal I find hard to swallow, especially with a Labor Day picnic ahead.

Obama nor McCain will save us

THE PROBLEMS AMERICANS CURRENTLY face seem insurmountable, and they only appear to worsen at every turn: the deepening moral and spiritual crisis, the erosion of civil liberties, militarism and perpetual war, our declining economy, joblessness, homelessness, the mortgage crisis, a disaffected youth, crime, violence and so on. But let's be honest: it's neither the Republicans' nor the Democrats' fault that we're in such a mess today.

We have no one but ourselves to blame.

We've gotten the government — and the society — we deserve. But what did we do to deserve this bloated, power-hungry, self-serving, war-mongering bureaucracy? How did our straight-laced Puritan nation of freedom-loving citizens give way to a self-absorbed, entertainment-obsessed society?

The answer is simple: we stopped caring, and we stopped paying attention. Consciously or unconsciously, we gave up on the American Dream and, in so doing, lost our way. The facts speak for themselves. Most Americans have virtually no idea what America stands for and little idea how their government should function. Seventy percent of American adults cannot name their senators or congressmen. Nearly a quarter can't name a single right guaranteed in the First Amendment. Two-thirds can't name the three branches of government.

A poll taken several years ago reveals that Americans are more familiar with the Seven Dwarfs, Three Stooges, Harry Potter, Homer Simpson and Superman than the news of the day, world leaders or classic literature. And although America spends in excess of $40 billion annually on public education, in comparing the literacy level of adults in 17 industrialized countries, America is number 10 on the list.

The American Dream was once encapsulated in the hope of freedom, the right to compete in a free market and the right to own a parcel of land that you could call your own. Now, that once noble dream has been reduced to a radical individualism that is best symbolized by cell phones and shopping in mega-malls.

In fact, Americans now spend more time in malls shopping than in churches or synagogues. By 1987, America had more malls than high schools.

This "sense of ultimate value" used to be found in community life and in religion. But community life has collapsed so much that, as author Alex Marshall observes, Americans live "in one of the loneliest societies on the earth." Church groups, union memberships, dinners at home with friends, bridge clubs, etc., have been all but decimated, only to be replaced by social networking sites like Facebook and MySpace that keep users at arm's reach and interacting on their own terms.

Even religion offers scant comfort anymore. Indeed, there is little spiritual depth to the politically correct, all-inclusive theology that passes for civil religion today. And Christian fundamentalism (and its political offshoot, the Christian Right), with its emphasis on amassing power and establishing a theocracy, is certainly not an answer to the American spiritual crisis.

Little surprise, then, that many Americans have turned to politics with an almost religious zeal as the answer to what ails the nation. "Change" and "Believe" campaign slogans have been trotted out, only to be eagerly picked up and chanted like religious mantras. However, we'd do well to remember that governmental bureaucracy is fervently anti-change.

If there is to be any real hope for change, it rests, as it always has, in "we the people" because while we may be a large part of the problem, we are also the solution. And there is great power in this.

Each generation of Americans faces the responsibility of protecting and defending the Constitution. It may be comforting to think that the problems facing America could be fixed by the next presidential election. But that is not going to happen. Neither Obama nor McCain will save us.

Any real, lasting change will have to come from within you and me — not from a political savior. Thus, if we want change, it is going to take all of us pulling together, working in our communities, addressing our all-too-real human needs.

We need to recapture the spirit of that ragtag band of revolutionaries who beat back the British Empire and gave us the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. That will mean turning off the television, switching off the computer screen, learning more about our history and getting educated on the basics of our government and Constitution.

Then we need to act on what we know. It may start with voting, but that's the least we can do. Active, direct citizen participation at every level — local, state and federal — is the only real hope for change. As Mahatma Gandhi once said, "We need to be the change we wish to see in the world."

The Amethyst Initiative, a group of college and university presidents from around the country, claim the current legal age to drink needs to be lowered. It has sparked a nationwide debate regarding the controversial subject.

So this week's Q-Line question asks:

How would lowering the legal drinking age play out? Do you think it would lead to more problems or make young adults more responsible when it comes to binge drinking?

Invasive species invade the U.S.

BY DAN CATCHPOLE
Associated Press Writer

SEATTLE Alishia Beckham uses a hand-mirror and a flashlight to defend the United States from foreign invaders.

Working aboard ships three football fields long that arrive in Seattle's bustling port stacked with truck-sized cargo containers, the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agricultural specialist scours for bugs, plants or pathogens that could lay waste to native species.

She checks around door frames, pipes, lifeboat winches and other nooks where an Asian gypsy moth might have laid its eggs.

Invasive species can quickly become ecological and economical disasters. The emerald ash borer beetle has killed over 30 million ash trees since it was detected in North America in 2002. European gypsy moths defoliate millions of forested acres every year from North Carolina to Wisconsin to Maine.

"There are so many places on a ship, it could literally take all day if you inspected every inch of the ship," Beckham said. "We do what we can."

Beckham carries a backpack full of tools: cards illustrating the moth's life stages, binoculars to inspect areas of the ship she can't reach, a paint scraper to pry off any egg masses, and a plastic container with a dead adult male and an egg mass to show crew members what she's looking for.

Most crews are very cooperative and want to know what to look for, Beckham says.

The Asian gypsy moth, like its European cousin, is a rapacious leaf-eater, but it eats a wider variety of trees. Unlike the flightless European female, the Asian female can fly up to 25 miles before laying its eggs, meaning it could quickly spread across the country.

In early August, Beckham stepped aboard a ship in Seattle plastered with more than 100 Asian gypsy moth egg masses, each containing up to 1,000 eggs.

Beckham ordered the ship escorted out of U.S. territorial waters immediately by the Coast Guard before the eggs started hatching.

"If there are a hundred egg masses and they start hatching, we can't send the ship through Puget Sound, because there are so many islands the caterpillars could land on," she said.

After hatching, the caterpillars let out a silken thread that the wind catches — this is called "ballooning." They can travel up to five miles depending on conditions.

"Once the larvae start ballooning, we're in trouble," said Customs and Border Protection Chief Eric Johnson.

He estimates if they hatched at a Washington port, they could infest the forest of the Cascade Mountains within five years.

The federal government spends over $1.3 billion every year on detecting, eradicating and controlling invasive species, according to the US Department of the Interior.

Very few nonnative species become invasive, but a single species can cause millions of dollars in costs. Zebra mussels annually cause over $5 million in damages in the Great Lakes. Cornell University researchers estimated in 2004 that invasive species cost the U.S. economy almost $120 billion each year.

The rise in international trade has increased the opportunities for invasive species to hitchhike into the U.S.

"A continued influx of invasive species is going to be in our future," said Jim Marra, an entomologist for Washington state's Department of Agriculture.

Russia and Japan monitor Asian gypsy moths, and share the information with U.S. officials, who use it to identify high-risk ports. The moth was detected this year in a port in China, which does not collect or share such information yet, according to Johnson.

Infestations can prompt bans on a country's exports.

"It might be in the best interest of a foreign country to not disclose that a major, major port is infested," said Beckham, adding, "But we've had very good relationships with foreign countries, from my experience. But who's to say?"

The myriad international and regional regulations covering invasive species and trade are imperfect. One of Beckham's colleagues found an Asian long-horned beetle larva burrowed into a wood shipping pallet.

The wood was stamped the seal of the International Plant Protection Convention, meaning it should have been heat-treated, which would have prevented the larva from getting into the wood.

Even an incoming vessel's food can harbor pests, such as fruit flies, said Beckham. A ship's food is often a testament to its worldwide voyages. Inspecting one ship recently, she found zucchini from Hong Kong, lemons from Argentina, melon from the U.S., apples New Zealand, Spanish beef and Dutch poultry.

To protect its agriculture industry, California requires ships to lock up food from certain countries while in port, said Beckham.

Outside San Francisco, state and federal officials are fighting the light brown apple moth. It has caused up to 20 percent crop loss in New Zealand, said John Sacks, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Plant Protection and Quarantine division.

For California, that could mean losses between $680 million to $2.7 billion if it becomes established.

Beyond points of entry, detection, eradication and control programs keep invasive species in check. Tools range from pesticide sprays to breeding sterile male insects.

Once within the U.S., invasive species can move around on things such as firewood, cars, plants, motor boats, even on mud-caked shoes.

Farmers use guns, poison to safeguard crops

BY TRACIE CONE
Associated Press Writer

FRESNO Farmers in "America's Salad Bowl" are turning into hunters — stalking wild pigs, rabbits and deer — to keep E. coli and other harmful bacteria out of their fields.

It's part of an intense effort to prevent another disaster like the 2006 spinach contamination that killed three people, sickened 200 and cost the industry $80 million in lost sales.

The exact source of the contamination was never discovered, but scientists suspect that cattle, feral pigs, or other wildlife may have spread the E. coli by defecating near crops.

The pressure to safeguard crops comes from the companies that buy fresh greens. In response, some farmers are taking gun-safety classes to learn how to shoot animals that could carry the bacteria. Others are uprooting native trees and plants and erecting fences to make their land inhospitable to wildlife.

Spinach grower Bob Martin has even poisoned ponds with copper sulfate to kill frogs that might get caught in harvesting machinery or carry salmonella on their webbed feet.

Produce buyers "got us by the short hairs," said Martin, one of few growers who would talk publicly about how he is protecting his crop.

But some officials have questioned whether such drastic measures are necessary based on limited evidence.

"We're trying to talk now with the companies, buyers, retailers, wholesalers to bring things back into balance," said Scott Horsfall, executive director of the Leafy

Scott Horsfall

Executive director of the Leafy Greens Handlers Marketing Board

Greens Handlers Marketing Board, which oversees new farming standards drawn up after the 2006 E. coli contamination. "There's a real pressure out there on growers that goes beyond what the science justifies."

Concern over contamination is most pronounced in the Salinas River Valley, where valuable farmland and sensitive wildlife have coexisted for centuries. The lush valley, described in John Steinbeck's "East of Eden" and nicknamed "America's Salad Bowl," grows 60 percent of the nation's lettuce.

The nonprofit Resource Conservation District of Monterey County, which works with landowners to sustain wildlife habitat, surveyed 181 leafy greens growers who manage more than 140,000 acres. The survey showed that more than 30,000 acres had been affected by trapping, poisoning, fencing or removal of natural habitat.

The survey also indicated that 32 percent of respondents were convinced by corporate food-safety auditors to remove non-crop vegetation. More than 47 percent had been asked to "remove" wildlife, and 40.7 percent of those surveyed complied.

Growers, packers and shippers adopted new food-safety standards last year for farms, including a requirement that farmers establish 30-foot buffers between their fields and grazing land for cattle, which are known carriers of E. coli.

The standards acknowledged that wildlife could also carry the bacteria, but they had no requirement for buffers between wildlife habitat and fields.

"I think there's a little brinkmanship going on," said Hank Giclas of Western Growers, who was part of the committee who wrote the standards. He worries that processors are exceeding the rules to gain a sales advantage without good science.

Going beyond the guidelines "without going through a review process is something companies have the right to do, but it would be better if they'd go through the program," he said.

Smaller growers argue that stricter guidelines aren't warranted for farmers growing fresh bunched greens. They say the problem is primarily with cut greens that are bagged, which allows bacteria to multiply if temperatures rise.

Industry representatives defend their above-and-beyond restrictions.

Fresh Express, with 41 percent of the bagged greens market, demands a mile between farm fields and feedlots for cattle instead of the agreement's recommended 400 feet. The company also requires that a field intruded on by a wild pig be kept idle for two years.

Barbara Hines, a spokeswoman for Fresh Express, which processes 40 million pounds of salad each month, said the company's tighter regulations are "generally valued" by its retail customers, which include grocers such as Safeway, Vons and Harris-Teeter.

Earthbound Farms also exceeds regulations in many areas, especially in seed and water testing and its one-mile requirement between farms and feedlots. But the company views fencing and removal of natural habitat as a counterintuitive last resort.

Habitat is what animals want. "If you remove it, they will go into the field," said Will Daniels, Earthbound's vice president of quality, food safety and organic integrity.

Fresh Express has funded a $2 million study into methods of potential E. coli transmission. Results are due next month.

The Western Institute for Food Safety and Security is conducting a separate study funded by the federal government. It plans to analyze carcasses and anal swabs from 7,000 birds, wild pigs, cattle and other animals collected by state officials. Hunters are being asked to turn in deer colons for the research.

Officials are also collecting 13,000 soil, water and plant samples in the hope that the study will rule out wildlife as risks and ease buyers' fears.

"We have two extraordinary resources in this area: wildlife and our agricultural community," said Terry Palmassno, a senior wildlife biologist at the California Department of Fish and Game. "It's our position that you don't need to destroy one in order to save the other, and that's what we're working on doing."

Caps a pain to recyclers

Dear EarthTalk

Everyone knows we should recycle metal, glass and plastic cans and bottles, but what about all the lids, tops and caps? I see people recycling plastic bottles, for example, with their caps on, but I've always been told to throw them out. Is that wrong?

Stefanie Gandolfi
Oakland, Calif.

Many municipal recycling programs throughout the U.S. still do not accept plastic lids, tops and caps even though they take the containers that accompany them. The reason is that they are not typically made of the same kinds of plastics as their containers and therefore should not be mixed together with them.

"Just about any plastic can be recycled," says Signe Gilson, Waste Diversion Manager for Seattle-based CleanScapes, one of the west coast's leading "green" solid waste and recycling collectors, "but when two types are mixed, one contaminates the other, reducing the value of the material or requiring resources to separate them before processing."

Also, plastic caps and lids can jam processing equipment at recycling facilities, and the plastic containers with tops still on them may not compact properly during the recycling process. They can also present a safety risk for recycling workers. "Most plastic bottles are baled for transport and if they don't crack when baled, the ones with tightly fastened lids can explode when the temperature increases," says Gilson.

Some recycling programs do accept plastic caps and lids, but usually only if they are off their containers completely and batched separately. Given the many potential issues, however, most recyclers would rather avoid taking them altogether. Thus it is hard to believe but true: In most locales the responsible consumers are the ones who throw their plastic caps and lids into the trash instead of the recycling bin.

As for metal caps and lids, they, too, can jam processing machines, but many municipalities accept them for recycling anyway because they do not cause any batch contamination issues. To deal with the potentially sharp lid of any can you are recycling (such as a tuna, soup or pet food can), carefully sink it down into the can, rinse it all clean, and put it in your recycling bin.

Of course, the best way to reduce all kinds of container and cap recycling is to buy in large rather than single-serving containers. Does the event you're holding really require dozens and dozens of 8- to 16-ounce soda and water bottles, many of which will get left behind only partly consumed anyway? Why not buy large soda bottles, provide pitchers of (tap) water and let people pour into reusable cups?

The same kind of approach can be taken with many if not all of the bottled and canned grocery items we buy routinely for the home. If more people bought in bulk, apportioning out of larger, fewer containers, we could take a huge bite out of what goes into the waste stream.

Partial settlement reached in Exxon Valdez case

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANCHORAGE, Alaska Part of the punitive damages awarded to plaintiffs in the nation's worst oil spill will be paid to Alaska fishermen and other plaintiffs, Exxon Mobil said last week.

Lawyers in the Exxon Valdez case have negotiated a settlement, under which about $383 million will be released by Exxon,

Under the deal, the money will be distributed to nearly 33,000 commercial fishermen and others who sued Exxon after the 1989 spill of 11 million gallons of crude in Prince William Sound.

"As we have stated consistently, like everyone involved in the tragic Valdez accident, Exxon Mobil is anxious to have the matter resolved," company spokesman Tony Cudmore said in an e-mail to The Associated Press on Tuesday evening.

"We approached the plaintiffs legal representatives with an offer to pay the punitive damages awarded by the Supreme Court on June 25, less certain costs and amounts relating to earlier settlements with former plaintiffs. The amount agreed with the plaintiffs is approximately $383.4 million." David Oesting of Anchorage, the lead attorney for the plaintiffs, told the Anchorage Daily News he and Los Angeles-based lawyers for Exxon negotiated the settlement over the past few weeks.

Oesting did not immediately return messages Tuesday night to the AP seeking comment.

Lawyers will continue to negotiate over $70 million and nearly a half billion dollars in interest.

Fishermen and other plaintiffs could see checks beginning in early October, Oesting said.

A jury in 1994 awarded plaintiffs $5 billion. That was cut in half by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. The Supreme Court in late June, by a 5-3 vote, reduced the total to $507 million.

The high court this month didn't rule on whether Exxon should pay interest and sent that issue back to 9th Circuit Court for a decision.

Interest calculated since 1994 would add an estimated $488 million, boosting awards to individuals from roughly $15,000 to about $29,400. Exxon contends it does not have to pay interest.

"In the company's view, if interest is payable, it should be from June 25, 2008 — the date that the punitive damages were decided by the Supreme Court," Cudmore wrote in his e-mail.

Frank Mullen, a Homer commercial fisherman, said he and other plaintiffs will certainly take the checks but they won't be happy.

"It's a damn small bone for an old, angry dog is what it is," he told the Anchorage Daily News.

THE EASIEST THING TO CUT IN YOUR YARD.

Cutting back your watering schedule by at least one day a week is certainly easier than cutting your yard. It's also an easy way to help Southern California's water supply. The fact is, years of record dry conditions and the state's fragile water supply and delivery system are affecting our supply. Even rain won't wash away the need for all of us to use less water.

We use up to 70% of our water outside our homes, so an easy way to join the 20-Gallon Challenge is to cut back watering at least one day a week. And your yard won't even miss it.

Local student forms stroke survivor group ket to treat the neurological disorder. The problem worsened during Bellamy's final semester at California State University Northridge where he was studying video production.

"You get this feeling coming over you, like an intensification of a sense," he said in describing a seizure. "It's this nauseating feeling that was pretty strong, like being on a roller coaster and not feeling well afterward."

Rather than try another drug, he agreed to undergo the test at UCLA, which involved a seizure study and later admittance to the hospital where he underwent a brain scan, which recorded three seizures.

Sometime during the tests, Bellamy suffered a stroke, leaving him with left-sided weakness.

Bellamy said he didn't even know he was experiencing one.

"It just felt like another moment," he said.

Bellamy, who had just started a temp job at Fox Sports the day before the stroke, spent months in recovery, doing physical therapy and trying to get back on his feet. Another temp job at Fox Sports came but he was let go after the first day.

He eventually landed a job at the Trader Joe's in West Hollywood, later transferring to the Santa Monica store where he still works.

Bellamy began seeking a support group last year to find an outlet for his experience, adding that a stroke can be an isolating experience.

"This is an important part of recovery and it's very helpful and important to see other survivors and know that you're not alone," he said. "During my recovery, I was only with my family and they're very encouraging, but it's very important to see others that have ... gone through the same journey that you're going through."

A stroke can especially be an isolating experience when it happens early in life.

While strokes in young adults are still considered rare, there has been an increase in the past decade, Lukomski said.

The group at Cedars-Sinai meets on the third Thursday of every month and gets anywhere from two to six people per gathering, the age of its members going up to 55 years old.

The members talk about their own recovery process and share ideas with each other. Some meetings include presentations by educational speakers.

Young stroke survivors have issues that are specific to their own age range, Lukomski said.

"They're just starting their career and trying to establish themselves in the world or in school," she said. "There's a lot of things that are unique to younger people that are now slowed down and makes it that much more difficult to just develop."

The number of seizures have slowed down since the stroke. Some days are good, others are worse, Bellamy said, noting that he can experience up to three partial seizures on a bad day.

Bellamy has left the video production world behind and wants to become a pharmacist, figuring he has some expertise since he has taken medication his whole life.

"The stroke changed my life," he said. "It dramatically gave me a greater perspective about things."

Transportation a major issue

was that their children could be harmed or kidnapped," said Jackie Epping, a CDC health scientist. "In fact, more kids are hurt by the cars of parents driving other kids to school — considerably more. The percentage of kids who are nabbed on their way to school is minuscule."

But the fear of abduction persists.

In the CDC's back yard of Atlanta, the public school system promotes families walking or biking together, said spokesman Joe Manguno. The intent is to combat obesity, not to foster students' independence.

"We haven't encouraged them to walk alone at any specific age," Manguno said. "Some of the neighborhoods are not such that we recommend it."

The school district in Mercer Island, Wash., an island suburb of Seattle with a population of 23,000, also encourages parents to walk or bike to school with their children.

"We never expect or encourage even 10-year-olds to be riding their bikes alone," said Superintendent Gary Plano. "We have a number of parents who are also walking with our middle school students."

Bob Livingstone, a clinical social worker in San Mateo, Calif., said kids he knows are driven to high school — even when public transportation such as the county bus system is available.

"Public transportation is viewed as a very scary thing," he said.

Livingstone said he works with parents of different races and income groups who all resist letting children walk or ride a bus by themselves.

"The attitudes about this whole subject are very similar," he said. "There's a lot of fear."

Lenore Skenazy, a columnist for the New York Sun, made a splash last spring when she wrote about sending her then 9-year-old son Izzy on a solo transit ride from Bloomingdale's to the family's Manhattan apartment a few stops downtown on the subway and a few blocks east on the bus.

"Long story short: My son got home, ecstatic with independence," she wrote. "Long story longer, and analyzed, to boot: Half the people I've told this episode to now want to turn me in for child abuse. As if keeping kids under lock and key and helmet and cell phone and nanny and surveillance is the right way to rear kids. It's not. It's debilitating — for us and for them."

After the story of the fourth-grader alone on the subway was picked up by media outlets around the world, with Skenazy alternately congratulated and vilified, she started a blog called Free Range Kids "dedicated to sane parenting."

She usually takes Izzy to school and he walks home.

SITTING A SPELL: Western snowy plovers can often be found resting on Santa Monica Beach.

Pelicans aren't alone as an endangered species

“As far as pelicans go, biologists have said that they’re having a good breeding year, which tends to mean that there are a lot of juvenile, fledging pelicans entering the environment,” she said. “This results in a lot of young pelicans coming in emaciated because they have not had enough to eat. Many adult birds have come in entangled in fishing line, too.”

King said that volunteers and staff have taken in about 50 pelicans entangled in fishing line out of the 160 they have helped just this year.

In the past two months, the San Pedro center has rescued about 350 birds.

“For us as rehabilitators, taking in a bird that had a very severe injury, getting them back up to peak condition, and then being able to release them when they’re healthy and strong ... is the most rewarding.”

But helping the birds does not come cheap. Rehabilitating a pelican costs about $20 a day, most of which is covered by donations or extra funding from outside organizations. The center also offers the “Adopt a Pelican” to help cover costs.

Although Pelicans makeup a majority of the animals rescued at the center, they aren’t the only threatened aquatic birds along the coast.

Lucien Plauzoles, president of the Santa Monica Bay Audubon Society, a volunteer organization which provides a “center for wildlife education, habitat protection, and conservation issues that involve birds,” examines different species.

“When Audubon adopts an area for bird watching, we have and keep little by little records of what birds are seen at what seasons, and notes of birds that are sick or dying,” Plauzoles, who monitors territories extending from Marina del Rey to Malibu, said. “If there is a lot of a certain bird affected, we’ll report our findings to the center in San Pedro.”

The society, part of the greater National Audubon Society, is currently working on a project with the L.A. and Palos Verdes Audubon Societies to help a threatened bird known as the Western Snowy Plover. Santa Monica Bay Audubon has been monitoring plovers for seven years.

“The big problem is that when we have a beach for humans, we want to groom it so we can have clean, white and soft sand,” he said. “But grooming also cleans up vegetation from the ocean that attracts small insects, which is what snowy plovers eat, so part of the game for us is to keep the natural material so they can survive.”

The city of Santa Monica has helped to resolve this conflict by designating certain areas for the bird along the Santa Monica beach north of the Jonathan Club, where some plovers tend to settle.

“We study birds, we like to see birds, and we contribute to any science or policies which will eventually help birds,” he added.

As you like, Libra

ARIES (March 21-April 19) ★★★★ Listen to news and feedback. You have much more to offer than you realize. People start challenging your ideas and thoughts. Others seem to hold the cards, making this a day to relax and be more docile. Tonight: Let it all happen.	LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) ★★★★★ The force is with you, if you are wondering. You can have and do what you want spontaneously – for better or for worse. You get to see your own agenda emerge very quickly. Tonight: As you like.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) ★★★★ Others count on you to get the job done, whether flipping a burger, having that important discussion or helping another person smile. Responsibilities probably will tumble on you from out of nowhere, as you seem so energetic. Tonight: Put up your feet.	SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) ★★★ You might need some time to kick back and relax. Even if you aren't at work, you might not want to socialize and party. Screen calls and make the most out of the moment. You simply 100 percent need a day off. Tonight: Vanish.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) ★★★★★ Somehow, you evaluate with an eye to making potential changes, some of which might involve your personal life, while others might involve your work. Though you could opt to not take action immediately, it might be interesting to consider. Tonight: Time to move on.	SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) ★★★★★ Zero in on what you want. You could be overwhelmed by the many different options that come up. Friends and colleagues seem endlessly creative and full of ideas. The real question is which way to go and whose suggestion you will choose. Tonight: You're unstoppable if you are focused.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) ★★★★ Basics always count for the Moon Child. No matter how you cut it, you might want to enjoy yourself with those who are key to your personal life. A conversation about real estate or investments could be more important than you think! Tonight: Happiest close to home.	CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) ★★★★ Take a stand. You are on top of your game and know what you want. Others might find you to be unusually pushy right now, even though you might not intend to be. You push hard to achieve your goal, which involves a meeting with others. Tonight: A must appearance.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) ★★★★★ You have a way with people. Once more, those skills emerge to save the day, meeting, event and/or party. Your high energy allows you to pitch in and do a little more. Tonight: Catch up on another's news.	AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) ★★★★ Reach out for someone at a distance who you care about. In fact, you might have an opportunity to meet halfway or plan getting together in the near future. Tonight: Tap into your imagination.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) ★★★ You might try very hard to maintain a stable budget, but even the practical Virgo can go a bit overboard. At least keep the tags, because there is always tomorrow. Ask yourself, Why the spending? Tonight: Say "no" to any additional spending.	PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) ★★★★ Deal directly with someone you really care about. Make time to take a walk or partake in a meal. Nothing replaces the personal touch. Use it wherever you can right now. Tonight: Go along with another's suggestion.

You see a big difference if you kick back and let events unfold this year. Curb a tendency to dominate; instead, let events run their course. Don't worry about being a wallflower. Your opinions and feelings reveal themselves even if you do not want them to. Others appreciate your expressiveness. If you are single, your desirability is evidenced by the actions of those around you. You probably will meet someone quite quickly. If attached, let your significant other be more dominant, although often you might feel you could be more efficient. Direct your high energy positively. LIBRA helps you spend. Ouch!

GETTING STARTED

There are many strategies to solving Sudoku. One way to begin is to examine each 3x3 grid and figure out which numbers are missing. Then, based on the other numbers in the row and column of each blank cell, find which of the missing numbers will work. Eliminating numbers will eventually lead you to the answer.

NEWS OF THE WEIRD
BY CHUCK SHEPARD

■ Prosecutors in Portland, Ore., took the death penalty off the table for Tremayne Durham in July, accepting a minimum-30-year prison term for an "aggravated murder" over a business deal. Durham agreed to plead guilty when prosecutors relented to his additional demand of two pig-out meals (featuring KFC, Popeye's and Haagen Dazs right away, and pizza and lasagna on the day the judge accepts the plea). Prosecutors said they hated appearing to cater to the whims of a murderer, but eyeing the expense of a long trial and lengthy appeals, as well as the turmoil for the victim's family, they agreed. In August, the judge accepted the deal.

■ Though it has been on national cable TV since mid-July, ratings have not been spectacular for the G4 channel's show, "Hurl!" leaving many Americans unaware of precisely how far standards of taste have fallen. "Hurl!" contestants are forced to gorge themselves, then are purposely, rapidly, twirled and shaken on carnival-type rides, with the last player to retain his stomach contents declared the winner. Wrote a Washington Post reviewer, it's "for people who found 'Fear Factor' much too nuanced."
