California voters to review criminal justice, bail reforms

DON THOMPSON
Associated Press

California voters will consider rolling back a host of criminal justice changes in what amounts to a referendum on whether the progressive state has become too lenient.

Proposition 20 would amend criminal sentencing and supervision laws enacted during the last administration of Gov. Jerry Brown that critics say are too favorable to criminals, while Proposition 25 could overturn a 2018 law that eliminates cash bail.

Voter sentiment on both measures is being shaped by growing public desire to change a criminal justice system that historically has treated racial minorities inequitably. Early voting begins Monday for the Nov. 3 election.

Organizations representing prosecutors and police chiefs, police unions, and several crime victims' groups are among those that want voters to reverse portions of two previously approved ballot measures, saying they impede investigations and can free serious offenders too soon.

Proposition 47 lowered penalties for drug and property crimes in 2014, while Proposition 57 in 2016 allowed the earlier parole of most felons.

"Whether it swings the pendulum back or it sends a message the pendulum has swung too far, I think that the real question is: Do people feel safe?" said Ron Lawrence, immediate past president of the California Police Chiefs Association.

Two district attorneys, Diana Becton of Contra Costa County and Jeff Rosen of Santa Clara County, broke with their association to oppose a ballot measure Rosen said would "roll back the clock" to a get-tough-on-crime stance.

The initiative would reinstate the list of crimes for which a perpetrator's DNA is collected, with supporters citing Golden State Killer Joseph DeAngelo's capture as a prime example of why a robust DNA database is important to crime-fighting.

Organizations representing grocers and retailers are among those backing a provision that would allow repeated thefts of property worth $250 or more to be prosecuted as felonies, after business owners complained that Prop. 47's misdemeanor penalty allows thieves to steal with impunity.

The change is aimed at organized theft rings that recognize they face little punishment if they steal up to the current $950 limit, Lawrence said: "Even if they're caught, because it's a misdemeanor they're only going to get a citation with a court date. They're not going to jail because the jail's full."

The initiative also would add 22 crimes to the list of those ineligible for earlier release under Prop. 57, including rape of an unconscious person. That provision drew attention after former Stanford swimmer Brock Turner spent just three months in jail for sexually assaulting an unconscious woman outside a campus fraternity party in 2015.

The measure also would toughen parole and supervised release standards.

"These were the four very narrow parameters that swung too far, to the point where people are being harmed," said Nina Salarno, president of Crime Victims United that backs the initiative.

Brown, who left office two years ago, put $1 million of his left-over campaign war chest into opposing the measure, primarily because it would undercut the 2016 initiative he championed to reduce the state prison population. About 80% of those considered for earlier parole are denied release, but Brown said that just the possibility "encourages people to turn their life around."

Crime Survivors for Safety and Justice California state director Tinisch Hollins said her group opposes the measure because it would disproportionately affect racial minorities. The nonpartisan Legislative Analyst projects it could boost criminal justice costs by tens of millions of dollars, money that she said would be wasted on more incarceration.

Property crime briefly ticked upward after Proposition 47 and after California began holding less serious offenders in county jails instead of state prisons under another Brown-backed legal change in 2011, but then continued a decades-long downward trend.

Meanwhile, voters had a partial taste of a justice system without cash bail last spring when the state eliminated bail for misdemeanors and lower-level felonies to protect suspects from catching the coronavirus.

The change reduced jail populations by more than 20,000 suspects, which Californians for Safety and Justice founder Lenore Anderson said demonstrates just how many people are detained for low-level offenses. But police and prosecutors soon began highlighting cases where newly freed suspects were arrested for new crimes.

If voters enact the new law, no one would pay bail and most misdemeanor suspects would remain free before trial.

But those suspected of felonies or misdemeanor domestic violence, sex offenses or driving while intoxicated would be evaluated for their perceived risk of committing another crime or not appearing in court. Most would eventually be released, unless they are accused of certain crimes like murder or arson, or if a judge finds there are no conditions like electronic monitoring that could assure their appearance at future hearings.

Lawmakers also added safeguards against racial biases in statistical models that would help court officials decide who could be safely released, Democratic state Sen. Bob Hertzberg said.

Brown signed Hertzberg's bill into law before the bail industry collected enough signatures to put it on hold until voters weigh in, and opponents including the NAACP say the risk assessments would still be biased against racial minorities and the poor.

Critics fear "the computer algorithm would let people out of jail who have no business being free and would hold people in jail who have no business being held," said former Democratic Assemblyman Mike Gatto, speaking for opponents.

Researchers at the nonpartisan Public Policy Institute of California found that the new process would likely release "more people from jail more quickly but does not address existing racial inequity in release decisions," particularly for Blacks.

The Legislative Analyst says the new process could cost hundreds of millions of dollars annually while cutting county jail costs by tens of millions of dollars.

The current system favors "people who are guilty but rich over those that happen to be innocent but poor," said Democratic Assemblyman Rob Bonta, who is among supporters.

Ryan Ole Hass writes that "Prop 19 will generate hundreds of millions of dollars for our schools and local governments." But he doesn't actually tell us what Prop 19 is or how it will achieve that. He omitted that Prop 19 curtails Prop 13 property tax protections.

Right now, parents can leave their homes to their children without a hike in their home's assessed value. But if Prop 19 passes, when a homeowner dies, their homes will be reassessed at current market value, unless the children make that home their principal residence.

If you plan on leaving your home to your kids, best to vote against Prop 19.

Prop 19 is backed by the California Association of Realtors. They hope that reassessing home values upon a parent's death will encourage children to sell the home, and thus generate more home sales and commissions for Realtors.

mexicana, and an "a la plancha" section that allows guests to create their own vegetable platters. For sweet lovers there is also a range of vegan popsicles and dessert tortillas with chocolate mousse.

De Buena Planta's beachy garden conjures visions of vacation as guests sink into Acapulco chairs, cosy up by the firepit, or relax under sprawling palm trees. Heather Tierney, Founder and Creative Director, was inspired by her favorite coastal Mexican towns like Tulum, Todos Santos when designing the space. In keeping with the laid back vibes, the pop-up is first come first served and open Wednesday to Sunday 4 p.m. to 10:30 p.m.

For those who don't want to order a whole meal there is a selection of chips and dips and an even a wider range of housemade cocktails, many of which feature the Butcher's Daughter's fresh pressed juices. So far the most popular have been the yuzu basil cocktail (mico tequila, yuzu, lemon, thai basil, simple syrup) and the soft smoke (verde mezcal, elderflower, ginger bitters, lime, amaro nonino, charred citrus).

"Living in LA we naturally are heavily influenced by Latin street vendors and restaurants — this menu was a homage to the different dishes we are so lucky to experience here in our own home town. You can easily travel across LA and experience the different subsets of Latin cuisine as if you were backpacking through South America. So, this has been a great privilege for us to have the opportunity to add our Butcher's Daughter twist to things," said Executive Chef, Richard Rea.

In a time where the restaurant industry is flailing, the Butcher's Daughter team is finding creative ways to flourish. With its entirely outdoor seating plan, De Buena Planta does not have to worry about adapting to changing government regulations. They've even managed to bypass the need to build a kitchen by doing some light preparation at the Butcher's Daughter and cooking everything else in a food truck parked out back.

Although L.A. already has several popular vegetarian and healthy Mexican eateries like Gracias Madre and Tocaya Organica, the creators of De Buena Planta believe it has something fresh to offer.

"De Buena Planta's menu is entirely gluten-free and plant-based, so it is 100% vegetarian, not 100% vegan. Gracias Madre is vegan so it lacks some of the ingredients that take Mexican food to the next level, like Oaxaca and cotija cheese. Tocaya is fast-casual/quick service, so it doesn't offer the experience of a full-service restaurant. They also do not have a full-bar program, which I think is essential. Tequila and mezcal go hand in hand with Mexican culinary culture!" said Tierney.

De Buena Planta is located at 1118 Abbot Kinney Boulevard, across the street from the Butcher's Daughter. It will be there until the end of the year, with the possibility of extending until June 2021.

California voters weigh in again on care at dialysis clinics

OLGA R. RODRIGUEZ
Associated Press

California voters will again weigh in on the quality of care dialysis clinics provide to about 80,000 people in the state with kidney failure.

Proposition 23 would require a doctor or highly trained nurse at each of the state's 600 dialysis clinics whenever patients are being treated to improve patient care. It was placed on the ballot by unions that represent health care workers.

Opponents, financed by dialysis clinic companies, say that under that mandate, between two and three doctors would be required at every facility because most are open at least 16 hours a day, creating a financial burden that could lead some clinics to close.

"There are a tremendous number of complications that can occur during and around dialysis, and a doctor onsite will be able to respond not only to emergencies such as cardiac arrest, bleeding, dangerous fluctuations in blood pressure — all other common side effects of dialysis — but they also will be able to oversee the overall quality of care," said Steve Trossman, a spokesman for the Oakland-based Service Employees International Union-United Healthcare Workers West, which spent more than $6 million in a signature drive to get it on the ballot.

Proposition 23 is the second attempt by the union to increase regulations of dialysis clinics in California, where DaVita Inc. and Fresenius Medical Care — two of the country's largest for-profit dialysis providers — operate about three-quarters of the state's dialysis market. Early voting begins Monday for the Nov. 3 contest.

In 2018, the union-backed Proposition 8, which sought to cap dialysis clinics' profits and force them to invest more of their profits in patient care. Voters rejected the measure but not before it became the most expensive initiative on the 2018 ballot, generating more than $130 million in campaign spending — more than $111 million from dialysis companies to kill the initiative and about $19 million from unions that supported it.

Dialysis providers say most California clinics already offer high-quality care and are regulated by federal and state authorities. They also point out all patients already have a nephrologist — a kidney specialist — who oversees their care and that nephrologists also direct each clinic in California. They say the initiatives are part of a tactic to pressure the dialysis companies to let workers unionize.

"The motive is to force the dialysis community to spend a bunch of money to defeat it because ultimately this is more about a union organizing battle. I have no doubt that in 2022 there will be another initiative on the ballot targeting dialysis providers and dialysis patients," said Kathy Fairbanks, a spokeswoman for No on Prop. 23, a coalition led by DaVita and Fresenius that also includes the California Medical Association and American Nurses Association-California.

The nonpartisan Legislative Analyst's Office estimates dialysis companies currently make roughly $3 billion a year from their California operations.

So far this year, the union has raised nearly $6.2 million backing it and the coalition against Proposition 23 has raised more than $93 million.

To stay alive, dialysis patients typically undergo four-hour treatments at least three times a week, during which the machines remove the blood in the patient's body, filter toxins out, then put the blood back in, essentially temporarily performing the functions of the kidneys but outside the body.

Rick Barnett, who runs the largest nonprofit dialysis provider in California, Satellite Healthcare, which operates 60 clinics in the state, said highly trained nurses and technicians already staff the clinics, and having to pay for two or three doctors per clinic would force most of the nonprofit's clinics to close.

"And then what happens to those patients?" Barnett asked.

DeWayne Cox, who is working with the opposition campaign and receives treatment at a DaVita clinic in Los Angeles, said if the goal were improving patient care, then proponents would focus on facilities that have issues.

"If there are facilities that have problems and poor outcomes, then let's focus on those facilities, don't just do a broad stroke and make everyone incur these costs that are unnecessary and dangerous," because they could lead to shorter clinic hours or closures, meaning patients would miss life-sustaining treatments, said Cox, 57, who has been on dialysis for 10 years.

Carmen Cartagena, 59, receives dialysis three times a week at a DaVita clinic in Walnut Creek and is working with the union to promote Proposition 23. She said she was convinced a doctor should always be at her clinic after seeing another patient drop to the floor bleeding. She says the woman was taken to a hospital and later died.

"I don't want to see somebody else die on that chair," she said. "It's a medical facility. I should feel safe."

Californians to vote on racial, gender preference programs

JANIE HAR
Associated Press

A California with vastly different political preferences and demographics is voting on whether to allow affirmative action in public hiring, contracting and college admissions — nearly a quarter century after voters outlawed programs that give preference based on race and gender.

If approved, Proposition 16 would repeal a 1996 initiative that made it unlawful for California's state and local governments to discriminate against or grant preferential treatment to people based on race, ethnicity, national origin or sex. Then-Gov. Pete Wilson, a Republican, championed the measure as part of his conservative bid for the presidency.

The California of 2020 is less Republican and more diverse than it was 24 years ago, with Latinos making up 39% of the population in a state where no group holds a majority.

Still, the repeal might not have made the ballot if not for the Memorial Day police killing of George Floyd while handcuffed by police in Minneapolis. Voters' decision will test support for the Black Lives Matter movement.

Assemblywoman Shirley Weber, a San Diego Democrat and chairwoman of the California Legislative Black Caucus, is the lead author of the legislation that put the question to voters, which required two-thirds support in both houses of the state Legislature.

"I think the death of George Floyd made racism very real for people; they could see it. And now what I was asking them to do was to act on it, stop telling me how horrible it is, stop telling me that you really didn't know that, stop telling me that this is such a revelation for you," Weber said.

She added: "Now the question becomes, what are you going to do about it?"

Early voting begins Monday for the Nov. 3 election.

The U.S. Supreme Court has long outlawed racial quotas, but it has ruled that universities may use tailored programs to promote diversity.

Last year, a federal judge in Boston rejected claims that Harvard's admissions policies discriminated against Asian American applicants to keep their numbers artificially low. The plaintiff, the Students for Fair Admissions group, is appealing.

Supporters of Proposition 16 include U.S. Sen. Kamala Harris of California, the Democratic nominee for U.S. vice president, Black Lives Matter movement co-founders, professional sports teams and politically liberal groups of all types. They argue that some programs are needed to help level a systemically racist playing field. The campaign has raised $14 million, far more than the $1 million raised by opponents.

Opponents include Ward Connerly, an African American businessman and former University of California regent who pushed for the 1996 ban.

They say government should never discriminate by race or gender, and the only way to stop discrimination is to end it. Joining Connerly are more recent Chinese immigrants who say the United States shouldn't play favorites based on skin color.

In 2014, activists scuttled an attempt to restore racial preferences in higher education and successfully voted out some Asian American legislators they called traitors to their race.

Assemblyman Evan Low, who is Chinese American, voted in June to put the issue before voters despite emails and phone calls running 37-to-1 against it. He rebuked proponents for failing to reach out to him and the broader Asian American community at a time when all minorities have reason to feel under attack.

"Yes, we have a moral compass, but we must have conversations, difficult ones, even with those communities in opposition, because we're all in this together, right?" said Low, a Silicon Valley Democrat, in June.

Supporters say minority- and women-owned businesses have missed out on public contracting dollars. Because of the ban, culturally specific programs aimed at improving high school graduation rates for African American boys and Latinas were discontinued, deepening divides.

And while some Asian Americans are admitted to elite universities in large numbers, affirmative action proponents say they too hit a "bamboo ceiling" that prevents them from landing executive-level positions.

On the other side, Tom Campbell, a former dean of the Haas School of Business at the University of California, Berkeley, said the college recruited minority applicants through strong outreach to high school students in nearby Oakland.

The legacy of slavery and Jim Crow segregation laws exists, he said, but, "I just will not engage in this method of correcting that, because it is wrong to the individual kept out because of her or his race."

Kali Fontanilla teaches English as a second language in Salinas, California and before that, tutored African American students. She identifies as Black and biracial, and said students of color don't need their standards lowered.

"That's insulting to me to say that there's certain groups that because of the color of your skin you're not meeting the standard, you can't meet the standard (so) we're going to help you, we're going to give you this crutch to get in," she said.

Higher education has long been a flash point in the debate and both sides point to admissions statistics at the University of California and its nine undergraduate campuses to make their case.

Opponents of affirmative action say Latinos have made significant progress without preferential treatment, making up 25% of undergraduates last year, double their share two decades ago.

Supporters of affirmative action note that Latinos make up more than half of California's high school seniors, with a graduation rate above 80 percent.

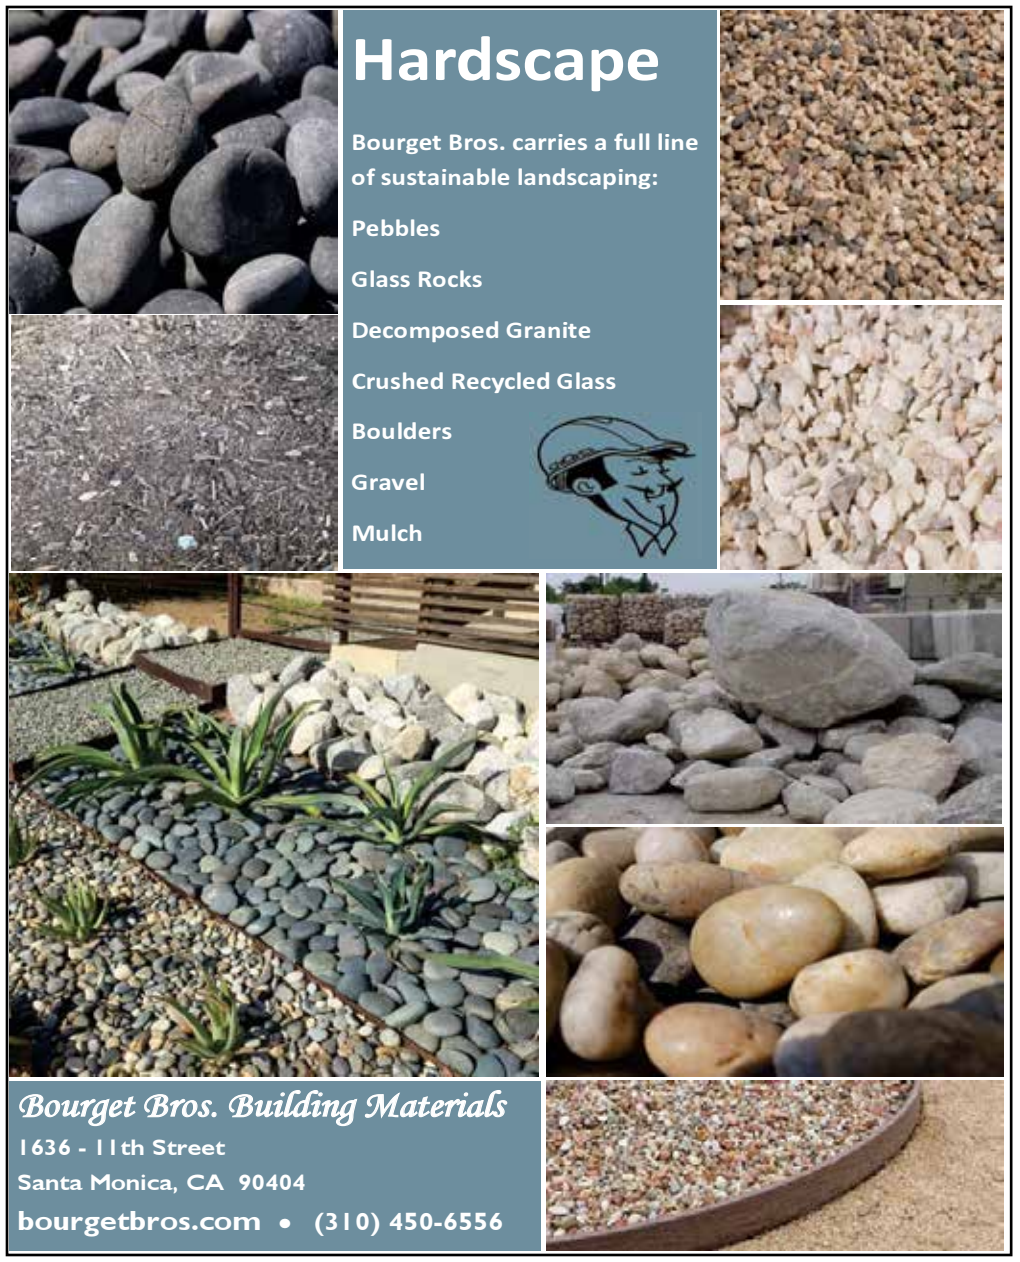

The population of California has also changed dramatically since 1996. The numbers of Latino and Asian American residents — and voters — have grown, although likely voters are still disproportionately white. Democrats still make up nearly half of registered voters, but the percentage of Republicans in the state has dropped from 36% to 24%.

Pet of the Week

Martin Hernandez

PET: The Adoptable Pet of the Week is available from the Santa Monica Animal Shelter.

Bebe

Hi I'm Bebe! I'm a 1-year old female Pitbull who is delightfully unconventional. I'm friendly and approachable, but I defy dog stereotypes by being no people pleaser. I love my share of toys, but my interpretation of the game of fetch is that the "fetching" part is optional. I can be social with dogs, but since my manners need work, I can be aloof. But when treats are involved, I'm willing to compromise by showing off my great skill in sit, stay, and down. I'd be best in a home with an adult family who can appreciate an independent thinker. Bebe, ID#A060344, is available for adoption at the Santa Monica Animal Shelter located at 1640 9th Street, Santa Monica CA, 90404. The shelter is closed to the public and adoptions are by appointment only by calling the shelter at 310.458.8595.

PET TIP OF THE WEEK: HOW TO PREPARE TO ADOPT A DOG

Last month's Clear the Shelter campaign and the COVID-19 Stay At Home Order has led to an uptick in adoptions. Before you adopt, it's important to know what is involved, and have a plan!

If you are a renter, review your lease to make sure they allow dogs and if there are any restrictions to a dog's breed and weight.

All dogs, regardless of breed, have unique temperaments. Determine what personality would fit well with your personality and lifestyle.

Many shelter dogs have their own behavioral challenges and health issues. Consider getting pet insurance and be open minded to training your dog. Training is a lifelong process.

If you own a dog, make sure your dog is introduced to the new dog prior to adoption to make sure they will get along.

Make your home dog proof. To prevent injury, illness, opportunities to get trapped or escape, determine whether to remove items from your home, and restrict them from unsafe areas.

Adjusting to a new home can be stressful for dogs. Have a plan for when you bring your new dog home that includes where your dog will sleep, their specific activities, rewards, and their daily routine.

Know your legal requirements as a dog owner. From annual dog licensing, to keeping your dog on leash at all times in the public, there are many pet laws that pet owners must adhere to. Contact your local Animal Control Division to obtain information on your city's pet laws.

Adopting a dog is one of the most rewarding experiences a person can have. Being prepared helps to facilitate the process of adoption, ensures they are the right fit for you, and supports a successful transition for your dog into your family.

Pet of the Week is provided by Carmen Molinari, a long-time volunteer at the Santa Monica Animal Shelter and founder and CEO of Love At First Sit, a pet care and dog training company in Santa Monica. Learn about her, pet tips, and Love At First Sit services at loveatfirstsit.net

TODAY'S BIRTHDAY (OCTOBER 05)

The events of this year seem designed to help you be your best by finding your strength, tapping it and controlling it. You'll have money to invest in a person, company or mission you believe in. You will not be repaid directly for this, but it will bring enormous good fortune and opportunity from unexpected directions. Scorpio and Aquarius adore you. Your lucky numbers are: 5, 7, 12, 40 and 1.

ARIES (March 21-April 19). What needs to happen will happen. You won't have to force it. You won't have to arrange it, invite it, manipulate it or even think about it at all. It will naturally go your way today, and you couldn't stop it even if you wanted to.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20). When people are nice to you, you assume that it's just the way they are with everyone. You don't typically stop to think, "What do they want from me?" although, today, that wouldn't be a bad thing to privately consider.

GEMINI (May 21-June 21). Simplicity and economy are excellent values to uphold in times of plenty and in times of want. Regardless of your current comfort level, knowing that you are operating without a lot of waste will feel so good.

CANCER (June 22-July 22). Your intuition is spot-on today. Not only can you trust your free associations, first impressions and gut responses but when you act on them, you'll be super lucky.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22). When someone is trying to lead your thoughts in a particular direction, it's a dead giveaway of selfish intent. Those who love you and want the best for you will trust your own knowing of what that is.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22). There are many seeds inside of you. Becoming who you want to be is a matter of growing the right ones. Unfortunately, many seeds look alike, and you won't totally know what's growing until it does.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 23). You will put your powers of imagination to excellent use by dreaming up a version of your future in which you are strong in relationships and you have everything that's needed to help a relationship thrive.

SCORPIO (Oct. 24-Nov. 21). If you were to only love those who love you back, how limiting life would be! Don't be afraid to invest the best of yourself where it won't be returned immediately, or possibly ever. Sacrifice is essential for spiritual health.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21). Don't even worry about being original. What you do originates with you, so how could it be anything but? Copying those you admire is part of learning. You might be surprised at how differently it comes out, though.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19). You give your full attention to anyone who needs it. The most telling mark of character is how a person treats those who can clearly do nothing for them. This is always in the back of your mind.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18). Just as you don't give much thought to where each individual raindrop falls, there are details you don't bother with because you accept them as part of a system. Today, forget the system. Look closer. Not every drop is rain.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20). Of course you focus better when you're interested. There's no crime in disinterest either. Sometimes your ability to hook into a subject comes down to scale. Zoom in and out to see if you can find a sweeter view.

as a time of freedom. Everyone sees it as a culmination of the past 13 or 14 years that you've been in school. I think that our senior class is especially close. Nobody is mean or bullies each other; we are like a family. It makes this year a little extra hard because we can't talk to our friends much," said Mia Wachtel.

Although the class contains around 700 students, many of them have grown up together at Lincoln and John Adams Middle School and were excited to participate in the communal events that typically bring the senior class even closer together.

"Before the pandemic started I was really looking forward to all of the pep rallies. It's super important for seniors to participate in the rallies — it's so exciting it feels electric almost. The crowd just goes crazy with how excited you are to celebrate your class. It's your last chance to enjoy life before you have all the responsibilities of college," said Brianna Cornejo-Perez.

"I was super excited for senior year because I saw my brother go through it and that's where he really got to establish not only his friend group but also establish what he wants to do in the future. He had such a fun time between the pep rallies, homecoming, and going to prom. I'm disappointed to miss out on all that," said Jeremy Platt.

Because of the limited opportunities for socialization, this year's seniors have become creative with the ways they can see and support each other.

"We have drive-through birthdays where we'll hang out in our cars and cheer on our friends or we will plan a group Zoom date because I know this is hard for a lot of people's emotional well-being," said Cornejo-Perez. "We have quick check-ins to see if friends are still doing well in school and doing well with their mental health. We all worry for each other; even if it's just a quick FaceTime call we try to make it happen."

While these students will graduate without experiencing many classic aspects of senior year, they will graduate equipped with a set of life lessons they may not have otherwise acquired.

"I feel like coronavirus has allowed me to reach into different parts of myself. When I had my most recent concussion it introduced me to staying at home and reflecting by myself. It showed me what it's like to be by yourself and what it's like to face challenges by yourself, whether that be school or having to deal with my mental state. The pandemic took that to the next stage. It has allowed me to face those challenges head on," said Guy Goes.

"Being on Zoom has taught me to refine my words more than normal and speak with care. This whole platform has turned me into a better public speaker and a more thoughtful and appreciative person of life outside of the screen," said Wachtel.

"I've learned that when there is a lot of uncertainty you should take control of your life and try to manifest things on your own rather than relying on people. It's really important to try and seek knowledge on your own rather than let things come to you and try to take advantage of all the different outlets that you do have," said Platt.

Students in Santa Monica High School's Class of 2021 are undergoing a senior year unlike anything experienced by the previous 126 graduating classes. While the interviewed students are uncertain what the rest of the school year will hold, they remain optimistic about the future.

"I think that we will go back to school in some format and I really hope that everything goes back to normal soon, because a lot of people are going through more stuff than ever," said Goes. "I think good things are coming that's all."
