City provides update on tenants' rights during COVID-19

CLARA HARTER
SMDP Staff Writer

Since Santa Monica issued its first eviction moratorium on March 14, tenants and landlords have been grappling with a constantly shifting legislative landscape of City, state and federal rental regulations. On Oct. 14, the City partnered with Bet Tzedek and the Legal Aid Foundation of Los Angeles to present on the current status of tenant protections.

"If you can't pay the rent because of COVID one of the most important things to know is you are not alone. Many tenants are not able to pay their rent right now because of COVID," said Romy Ganschow, Staff Attorney at Legal Aid Foundation of Los Angeles. "Even if you've already told your landlord that you can't pay the rent because of COVID, there is a new state law that will require you to take some additional steps to make sure that you won't be evicted for not paying the rent."

If residents receive a notice asking for rent due from March 2020 through Aug. 2020 they should provide their landlord a declaration of COVID related financial distress to protect themselves from eviction proceedings. For rent due from Sept.

OFFICE: The district will move into a new office space located next to Santa Monica High School.

CLARA HARTER
SMDP Staff Writer

The Santa Monica Malibu School Board has voted six to one to approve the $21 million purchase of the DoubleTree office building on 1717 4th St. to become the new District headquarters.

During the Oct. 15 meeting, some members of the public questioned the appropriateness of buying an expensive property during the pandemic without prior public discussion, while Board members said this is a unique and financially prudent opportunity that is too good to pass on.

This purchase, which has been under closed session discussion for almost a year, will unite all District departments under one roof adjacent to the Santa Monica High School Campus. It will be financed by Certificates of Participation and Redevelopment Agency funding and not deplete the General Fund. The District plans to lease its current headquarters at 1651 16th St and eventually direct revenues to the General Fund.

"It's an opportunity and this is the last chance we're going to get to do this. When somebody else buys

Equity plan prompts emotional discussion at SMC

BRENNON DIXSON
SMDP Staff Writer

The Santa Monica College Board of Trustees has delayed discussions relating to campus equity after a recent study session triggered strong emotional reactions from officials.

At the special study session held in September, staff, students and college stakeholders gathered to discuss aspects of policy and leadership that are key to promoting equity and guided pathways reforms. The college's greatest challenges, campus culture and the equity efforts that are already underway at SMC were other important topics that arose during the four-hour discussion.

Black Collegians Program lead Sherri Bradford said when you look at the hours of discussion previously presented, it's plain to see there has been work put forward that looks to help SMC become a more equitable college.

"But we have to be realistic and honest about where we are right now," she said.

Bradford asked the audience to remember during her presentation that the college does a lot of things well but, by the same token, there are so many things the college needs to fix.

"We, like the rest of America, are a racist institution. We have navigated in a system of white supremacy. And that is challenging even for me to say — it is difficult for me to say," Bradford said. "But if we are going to try and attack the things that we know are affecting our students — that are affecting the employees of the college — then we have to name them and address it."

Presenters later added the college has got to learn to be comfortable with the uncomfortable because the data shows SMC's Black and Latinx students don't feel the same sense of belonging at the college.

"We're making progress but we haven't gotten to the point where everybody is," Academic Senate President Nate Donahue said, before staff shared a survey question detailing 49% of Black students felt feelings of frustration or anger towards the college.

Trustee Margaret Quiñones-Perez said shortly after Donahue and Bradford's presentation that what she heard only proved that institutional racism has not disappeared from the college campus.

"And it will never go away until we as a society have totally eradicated the ability to judge somebody on the color of their skin," she said.

"I don't see that happening in our lifetime," Quiñones-Perez added as she refuted an earlier characterization that the institution was fundamentally racist.

"I agree that the college has racist institutions… but I'm not going to sit here and say that Santa Monica College is a racist institution. That is not true! That there are racist behaviors, that there are racist processes — I'll own that," Quiñones-Perez said. "But I've also seen certain departments, even some of the departments of color that will favor certain people if (they're) their own race and ignore the others," like the rest of the groups don't matter.

"You want to talk about deep hurt, that's a mortal wound," Quiñones-Perez said, adding: "If you think that white guilt is gonna help us fight racism in this country — you're wrong."

Fellow Trustee Barry Snell said prior to Quiñones-Perez's speech that the board should take the thoughts that were presented and spend some time really thinking about what the college's goals and priorities are.

The board agreed to defer a decision about its goals and priorities until a later meeting so a discussion about equity returned to the agenda for the Board's Oct. 6 meeting, but no action was taken then either.

Snell mentioned in October that he was truly impressed with what he witnessed during the special study session, which he described as an incredibly difficult workshop.

"Santa Monica College is not immune from systemic racism and the words that we heard in our workshop are true," he said, noting his commitment to the college, its community and the city of Santa Monica. As a result, "I was really troubled by Trustee Quiñones-Perez's comments; I felt they were divisive; There was no basis for some of it," and there was a sense that there wasn't an open discussion, which Snell said he hopes to have during its next workshop.

this building it's gone, and if we need to move headquarters, who knows where that's going to be or when that's going to be. It can't possibly be as convenient as this, which is actually on land we own on the Samohi campus," said Board member Craig Foster.

The District owns the land that the DoubleTree office is located on and is purchasing the building and accompanying parking spaces. Due to pandemic related setbacks and the extensive research and consultation process undertaken by the District, the deadline for a decision has been pushed back multiple times. According to Carey Upton, SMMUSD Chief Operations Officer, the District has used up all extensions available and was at risk of losing the opportunity if the Board failed to approve the purchase.

The urgency with which the decision on the action item was being made, without being first brought as a discussion item for the public to weigh in on, caused some discontent.

"I think that you will find that many of the people listening to the meeting tonight will find it mind boggling that you were making a transaction this large as an action item without bringing it before the public. I know that you guys may have been looking at it for a long time, but you are a small group of people responsible to the public, and it is our funds and our land. You owe it to us to bring it before the public to review," said Nikki Kolhoff.

While almost every key Board decision is presented for public discussion, real estate negotiations are allowed to be conducted privately under the Brown Act. After the DoubleTree approached the District with the purchase opportunity the District held discussions in private to try and achieve the best deal possible.

"I want to reiterate that this is an anomaly. It's not the norm that we do deliberations in private except for in areas that the Brown Act allows for, and this is simply one of those," said Board member Laurie Lieberman. I was skeptical at first about this, but I've been satisfied by the answers that we've been given and by the diligence we've done as a board and that our staff and our consultants have done for us. I want to support this and say that I really think it's a smart decision."

Oscar de la Torre was the only board member to vote against the purchase. He sought a two week extension on the vote and a discussion of other options for future use of the current 16th street headquarters beyond leasing it as commercial real estate.

"It's almost a $30 million project and it's something that we don't really need right now," said de la Torre. "No one has said we need this; it's almost like a want and we've got to respect the taxpayers."

TENANTS

2020 through Jan. 2021 tenants must provide a declaration of COVID related financial distress and also pay 25% of rent due.

The declaration requires tenants state that they can't pay rent for one of the following reasons due to COVID: loss of income, increase in expenses, childcare or financial responsibilities, or other financial impacts of COVID. Only one reason needs to apply and tenants do not need to tell their landlord which reason impacts them.

"If the restaurant you used to work at closed because of COVID that counts as loss of income related to COVID-19. Or, if you had to stop working because your kids were sent home from school that's also a loss of income due to COVID-19. Then if you're able to keep working but now you have to pay more for childcare expenses because schools are closed, that causes increased expenses due to COVID-19," said Hana Kommel, attorney at Bet Tzedek.

This declaration does not require any supporting documents but it must be signed under oath. The only exception is if a landlord has evidence that a tenant was high income prior to the pandemic, such as a rental application stating an annual income of $150,000. In this case a landlord could ask for proof of financial distress due to COVID.

In addition to these statewide protections the City's emergency orders provide limits on eviction. Through Dec. 31, landlords in Santa Monica cannot pursue evictions for unauthorized occupants, pets, failure to provide access (unless urgent repairs needed), nuisance, or owner move-in.

"One of the most important things that we want you to take away from this meeting tonight is that we are all here to help you. There are several laws that protect tenants in Santa Monica. Tenants who have lawyers are more than 70% more likely to avoid eviction than those who don't," said Eda Suh, Chief Deputy City Attorney in the City's Public Rights Division.

Bet Tzedek and LAFLA provide legal help to a combined 140,000 low-income residents in L.A. County each year. Both organizations offer free legal advice to tenants who have been issued an unlawful detainer or eviction notice. The City Attorney's Public Rights Division answers questions and takes complaints related to tenant harassment, the eviction moratorium, and code enforcement.

Meals on Wheels West Delivering More Meals Each Month

By Ashley McGullam

Meals on Wheels West is on the forefront of innovative home-delivered meal programs and will continue Delivering More Than a Meal to people who are having difficulty purchasing and preparing meals.

Meals on Wheels West's ability to adapt their heritage program to meet the needs of underserved communities including veterans and the formerly homeless, allowed MOW West to expand their programs to meet the increase brought about by the COVID pandemic.

Meals on Wheels West volunteers and staff are on the front line, focusing on doing everything they can to keep quarantining older residents, the chronically ill, and immune-compromised people safe and nourished.

MOW West implemented strict COVID-prevention protocols and has delivered more than 75,000 meals since March without a single client, volunteer, or staffer being infected. The COVID-19 pandemic has increased the demand for Meals on Wheels in Santa Monica and the surrounding coastal communities. The number of meals served to vulnerable community members increased by 61% last month, compared to the previous year. There is hidden hunger even in the most affluent communities.

"These are unprecedented times. Delivering high-quality, nutritious food to those who are most susceptible to the COVID-19 pandemic is critical. More than 200 volunteers have stepped forward and are not only delivering meals, they are also monitoring the health and wellness of our clients," said MOW West Executive Director Chris Baca. "Our dedicated, brave volunteers are putting themselves on the frontline each and every time they deliver meals to their neighbors in need. Our clients and staff are very grateful to them."

To volunteer to deliver Meals on Wheels or to donate, please call 310-394-5133.

Kindling Wildfire Solutions with Today's Technology

By Miceala Shocklee

The combination of late summer heat plus early fall's dry conditions saw blazes light up and down California this year. Technology might not be the first tool that comes to mind when considering how best to tackle wildfires, but modern invention has played an increasing part in beating back the blaze.

Before there's an out-of-control burn, technology allows for monitoring and prevention. The U.S. Forest Service has several laboratories around the nation dedicated to tracking climate trends and past burn patterns in order to predict where the next spark might erupt. The San Dimas Technology and Development Center specifically tackles the question of what technological needs the forest service has, and how to improve current equipment in order to meet them.

In a growing effort to mitigate the loss of human life associated with firefighting, the forest service has also started to employ drones in areas where it's purely too hot for even today's firesuits to handle. But, technology is tackling the game indirectly, too - literally. VR is currently used to help train smokejumpers – firefighters who are aerially dropped into wildfire locations – how to handle changing conditions, from heat to smoke to even changing wind directions.

To learn more about wildfires, the research around them, and what you can do to pitch in and prevent, check out the U.S. Forest Service's website at www.fs.usda.gov/science-technology/kfire/fire-research.

Dr. Miceala Shocklee is a Caltech alumna and graduate of the University of Edinburgh veterinary school. Her reporting interests include the intersection of science, technology, conservation, and the written word.

A Common Computer Problem and How to Fix It

By Mark Presky

Over the years, computer hard drives have gotten larger and larger. But, the programs and the other files we load onto our computers have also gotten even larger and more numerous. Eventually, this often becomes a problem when one computer starts running more slowly, or when one's computer informs you that it just cannot hold any more.

One way to deal with this problem is to free up space on the hard drive or SSD (solid state drive). Use the built-in Disk Cleanup tool in Windows 10. Click on the Start menu. Choose All Programs. Select Accessories, then System Tools. Click on Disk Cleanup.

Under the Files to delete heading, choose which file types you want to remove. If you are not sure about which file types to get rid of, select each one in turn and read its description. When you've selected the file types to delete, click OK.

Another method to free up space is to manually go through your files and delete the many of them that you don't really need or want. Image (photos), audio (music), and video (audio and image) files can take up huge amounts of file space. How many photos of little Tommy, or of Grandma from your last birthday celebration do you really need? I'll bet you have many duplicates of virtually every shot. Delete the duplicates, at the least.

Have music files on your computer that you never listen to? Again, delete them. Now, repeat this process with your vacation photos. Lots of old photos of your ex? Remember that song from the movie, Wash those files right out of your computer.

Another trick here is to reduce the file size of those photos. Most cameras produced in the last several years take photos that are each over two megabytes (MB) in size. Unless you plan to print those large file size photos, you might think about reducing each photo to between 200 and 400 kilobytes (kb). The reduced file size photos won't look any different to you when you view them on your computer. One can even reduce the photo file sizes en masse. If taken on your iPhone, the phone will ask you what size you want the file to be when you send them, via email, but there are several other programs that do this.

Going through those extra, unneeded files can be laborious and time consuming, but that might beat having to buy another computer, having a larger hard drive installed and having all the files transferred, or having your computer crash.

Thoughts From a Second-Time Father

Distance Learning in 2020

By Michael Margolin

Needless to say, this year has been unlike any other. We have grown accustomed to new norms and new terms. We are wearing masks and socially distancing. The word Zoom will probably never be heard the same way again – especially since it seems like most kids in America are now Zooming to school instead of actually going to school.

Jake will begin preschool in person with a very small class and plenty of safety and COVID-related protocols in place. Alexa has started second grade the way nobody ever thought they would, but the same way most students across the country are. She gets in front of her Chromebook and logs on.

We have made it through the first week with what I would consider minimal technological and emotional issues. And, although she can see her classmates and see and listen to her committed teacher, it is obviously not the same as going to school. It is as if every day that passes, they lose the opportunity to socialize. Not actually being at school and not being able to socialize is losing out on such a key element of growing up.

Hopefully, they can go back soon and safe, so they do not miss out too much. If they miss several months of being together in person, it will not be the end of the world. Of course, that saying also seems to carry a little more weight now, as well.

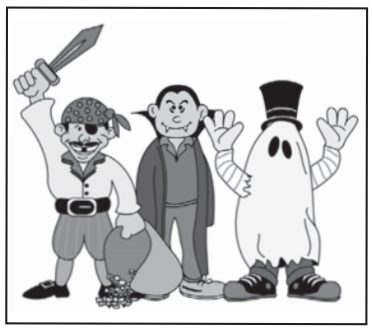

There have been several instances over the last few weeks in which I have been fortunate to see little looks of magic on my children's faces. I have written before about the many snapshots or moments that will be logged into my memory forever. We went swimming at friend's house recently and Jake would jump in the pool from a ledge a couple of feet up. And, being there to catch him and seeing the proud and confident smile on his face as our tiny crowd cheered him on before he would jump to me, is a small but priceless moment. Anything to take the mind off the woes of the world for even a second is marvelous.

Alexa has lost three teeth so far, with a number of others ready to vacate her gums at any moment. One tooth was just barely hanging on, and so we decided to go into the bathroom and give it a light tug. Enjoli gently pulled the tooth, and with just less resistance than a grape would give being pulled off a stem, the tooth came out.

There was some blood, but not too much. Alexa was a little surprised at how simple the process was. That was, until she turned around and looked in the mirror. To her absolute shock and horror, the blood she saw in her mouth must have looked like a crimson river. Her calm steadiness disintegrated into a flood of tears and angst. Alexa is seven, and I do not know if I had seen her emotions change so quickly. I have not seen most people's emotions change so dramatically.

Luckily, for all of us, the drama was short lived. She was promptly back to remembering that the tooth fairy would be visiting that evening. And, the tooth fairy did visit. The look on Alexa's face when she told me in the morning that our winged tooth collector had come was marvelous. Again, I was provided with a snapshot I will not soon forget.

Michael Margolin is the father of two young children. He is an avid sports fan and a soccer coach on Alexa's team.

Happy Halloween!
