A brush fire broke out Monday morning in Pacific Palisades, according to the Los Angeles County Fire Department.

The fire ignited around 10:30 a.m. at 500 N Palisades Dr. and burned 30 acres uphill, according to the Los Angeles County Fire Department. More than 150 county and city firefighters battled the fire on the ground and from helicopters, bringing the blaze under control by noon. No structures have been burned and one firefighter injury has been reported.

The fire threatened several multi-million dollar homes along Vista Grande Drive and Charmel Lane, according to LAFD. Sky5 helicopters captured video of residents fleeing their homes and trying to repel the fire with garden hoses.

The area is home to many schools, including Westside Waldorf School, Marquez Charter School, Cavalry Christian School, Le Lycee Francais de Los Angeles. Chabad of Pacific Palisades and the Self-Realization Fellowship Temple are located just south of the burn area.

LAFD issued a mandatory evacuation order for all residents within the area bordered by Charmel Lane on the west, Bienveneda Avenue on the east, the end of Lachman Lane on the north and Merivale Lane on the south. An LAPD spokesperson said the order affects about 200 homes.

All persons in the area were directed to leave immediately in a

Man dies by suicide while fleeing police on the beach

Santa Monica Police Department officers shot a man after he produced a handgun while fleeing an alleged attempted murder Sunday night.

Officers heard two gunshots from the end of Bay Street near Santa Monica State Beach and found a man who had just shot into an occupied vehicle, said SMPD Lt. Candice Cobarrubias. Officers pursued the man after he did not comply with their commands and fled on foot, running southwest onto the beach. He produced a handgun while running and officers fired at him, Cobarrubias said.

Cobarrubias said a preliminary investigation indicates the man died after suffering a self-inflicted gunshot wound. The man was pronounced dead at the scene.

Victims inside the occupied vehicle were not struck by gunfire or injured in the incident, Cobarrubias said.

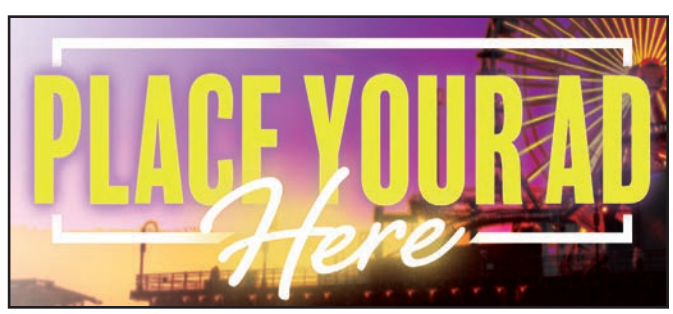

She added the investigation is ongoing and SMPD will provide further information at a later time.

SMPD officers shot an armed burglary suspect in September at 11th and Pine streets and a man resisting arrest in July at 10th Street and Pacific Avenue. Neither shooting was fatal.

Clusters of illness linked to CBD vapes share 2nd connection

BY HOLBROOK MOHR
Associated Press

CARLSBAD, Calif. (AP) — Some of the people rushing to emergency rooms thought the CBD vape they inhaled would help like a gentle medicine. Others puffed it for fun.

What the vapors delivered instead was a jolt of synthetic marijuana, and with it an intense high of hallucinations and even seizures.

More than 50 people around Salt Lake City had been poisoned by the time the outbreak ended early last year, most by a vape called Yolo! — the acronym for "you only live once."

In recent months, hundreds of vape users have developed mysterious lung illnesses, and more than 30 have died. Yolo was different. Users knew immediately something was wrong.

Who was responsible for Yolo? Public health officials and criminal investigators couldn't figure that out. Just as it seemed to appear from nowhere, Yolo faded away with little trace.

As part of an investigation into the illegal spiking of CBD vapes that are not supposed to have any psychoactive effect at all, The Associated Press sought to understand the story behind Yolo.

The trail led to a Southern California beach town and an entrepreneur whose vaping habit prompted a career change that took her from Hollywood parties to federal court in Manhattan.

When Janell Thompson moved from Utah to the San Diego area in 2010, the roommate she found online also vaped. Thompson had a background in financial services and the two decided to turn their shared interest into a business, founding an e-cigarette company called Hookahzz.

There were early successes. Thompson and her partner handed out Hookahzz products at an Emmy Awards pre-party, and their CBD vapes were included in Oscar nominee gift bags in 2014. In a video shot at a trade show, an industry insider described the two women as "the divas of CBD."

Indeed, Hookahzz was among the first companies to sell vapes that delivered CBD, as the cannabis extract cannabidiol is known. Now a popular ingredient in products from skin creams to gummy bears, cannabidiol was at that time little known and illegal in some states.

The partners started other brands that offered CBD capsules and edibles, as well as products for pets. Part of Thompson's pitch was that CBD helped treat her dog's tumors.

By autumn 2017, Thompson and her partner formed another company, Mathco Health Corporation. Within a few months, Yolo spiked with synthetic marijuana — commonly known as K2 or spice — began appearing on store shelves around Salt Lake City.

Synthetic marijuana is manmade and can be manufactured for a fraction of the price of CBD, which is typically extracted from industrial hemp that must be farmed.

Samples tested at Utah labs showed Yolo contained a synthetic marijuana blamed for at least 11 deaths in Europe — and no CBD at all.

Authorities believed that some people sought out Yolo because they wanted to get high, while others unwittingly ingested a dangerous drug. What authorities didn't understand was its source.

Investigators with Utah's State Bureau of Investigation visited vape stores that sold Yolo, but nobody would talk. The packaging provided no contact information.

By May 2018, the case was cold. But it was not dead.

That summer, a former Mathco bookkeeper who was preparing to file a workplace retaliation complaint began collecting evidence of what she viewed as bad business practices.

During her research, Tatianna Gustafson saw online pictures showing that Yolo was the main culprit in the Utah poisonings, according to the complaint she filed against Mathco with California's Department of Industrial Relations.

Gustafson wrote that while at Mathco she was concerned about how Yolo was produced, that it was excluded from Mathco's promotional material and that the "labels had no ingredients or contact listing."

Justin Davis, another former Mathco employee, told AP that "the profit margins were larger" for Yolo than other products.

Gustafson's complaint asserted that Mathco or JK Wholesale, another of the companies that Thompson and her partner incorporated, mixed and distributed Yolo. Financial records in the complaint show Thompson's initials as the main salesperson for Yolo transactions, including with a company in Utah. The records also show Yolo was sold in at least six other states, including to an address in South Carolina where a college student said he vaped a cartridge that sent him into a coma.

The former bookkeeper also tipped the Utah Poison Control Center about who she believed was behind Yolo, according to her complaint.

Barbara Crouch, the poison center's executive director, recalled getting a tip in late 2018 and passing it along to the State Bureau of Investigation. SBI agent Christopher Elsholz talked to the tipster, who told him she believed the company she had worked for distributed Yolo. Elsholz said the company was in California and therefore out of his jurisdiction, so he passed the tip to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The DEA offered to help but took no law enforcement action, spokeswoman Mary Brandenberger said. Spiked CBD is a low priority for an agency dealing with bigger problems such as the opioid epidemic, which has killed tens of thousands of people.

When it comes to domestic violence numbers, bring your rock salt

The domestic violence community has a major problem: its numbers. Depending on what your political ideology is, the numbers can be swung to castigate every man for being a brutish thug, and every woman is a frail, damaged, abused victim, or vice versa. There are almost no absolutes in the world of domestic violence – everything is a lighter shade of grey or a darker shade of white.

Driving the confusion is the age old sources of conflict: money, love and power. It is in the DV community's interest to expand definitions, increase the numbers of abused and violated individuals, and (pardon the pun) beat the drum for more money and resources. People's desperate search for love drives bad relationships and sustains toxic ones, which is why victims on average "leave" a relationship seven times before finally breaking up for good. Then there is the power struggle of the shelter directors for grant money, DV advocates who crave the publicity, public advocates who have a good heart, vote seeking politicians and the non-profit executive directors who thrive on the work they do saving lives.

Researchers have a nightmare of a time with the data as well as the social workers. On the one hand you have clear definitions of abusive behavior when there is a physical manifestation of harm – bruises, black eyes, broken bones, mayhem (bodily mutilations) and murder. On the other hand you have the vague terms and "soft" areas like "harassment" or "disturbing the peace" – is that 10 texts in a 12 hour period? Is that a raised voice? In my loud Italian/German home, raised voices were indicative of passionate beliefs not abuse, except when they were. I still shudder at the memory of the way my mother would yell at me in a drunken rage.

How can we draw the lines and definitions when the utter complexity of human interactions is limitless? One theory is that to be trauma informed, we should always consider things from the point of view of the "victim" – that abuse is in the eye of the "weaker" person. I am not such a proponent of that, as oftentimes I step on someone's toes unknowingly – does that make me an abuser or just ham handed? For example, two weeks ago, I'm at Dagwood's on Wilshire and a friend of mine happens to be in line directly ahead of me. As he finishes his order, he steps back into my space, and I gently put up my two index fingers into his back to stop him. He turned around and was visibly shaken. I clearly triggered some emotional trauma in him from his past. He politely asked me to "never do that again."

I felt, and feel, horrible about a mishandled interaction. I meant nothing by my actions beyond a mere warning that he was about to step into me. He meant nothing by stepping back, he didn't realize I was there. We both could parlay the 'victim card' but the reality is that there was no ill intent on either part.

How could a social researcher spin our respective perceptions? Any way they want. Their personal biases could, and likely would, color how they portrayed what is, in reality, an innocent set of circumstances. How could a lawyer with an agenda spin this? Any way they want. I could be incensed at his "invasion of my personal space" and he could be affronted at my "battery of him".

Thankfully, the underlying relationship I have with my friend means that we will survive this and move on. I will respect his perspective and act differently in the future.

But the current social environment we are in, means that the numbers and statistics that state that 1 in 4 women has been abused, raped, violated and assaulted are likely as accurate as the data that 70% of all domestic abuse incidents are started by women. Or the data that states that 50% of abuse is mutual combat. And 2/3rds of all abuse isn't even reported by the male or the female victims and I am still looking for someone to explain to me how you can have a number for something that ISN'T reported – seems illogical to me.

In sum, the point of this is that it's all about perspective, and we should always take this information in, with an open mind, and a giant rock of salt to consider what is the hidden agenda and/or bias of the reporter. And that includes me. As a survivor of a violent chaotic childhood, I have certain biases. As a lawyer who has represented people on both sides of the DV knife I can honestly say, sometimes it's the man who is the aggressor and sometimes it's the woman, they just do it differently, and that needs to be considered as well.

City files opening brief in CVRA appeal

MADELEINE PAUKER
SMDP Staff Writer

The city of Santa Monica filed its opening brief Friday in the appellate phase of the voting rights case initiated by Latino residents who allege the city's election system dilutes their voting power.

A trial court issued a final judgment in February that the city's at-large election system resulted in City Councils that did not represent Santa Monica's Latino population, which has historically clustered in the Pico neighborhood, and therefore violated the California Voting Rights Act. The ruling ordered the city to hold a special election on July 2 to elect councilmembers to represent seven neighborhoods of the city based on a map drawn by the plaintiffs, Maria Loya and the Pico Neighborhood Association.

The city appealed the ruling and applied to halt the special election until the appellate court issues a decision by July 10, 2020.

Ted Boutrous of Gibson Dunn & Crutcher LLP, the city's appellate counsel, said the city's initial brief argues that the trial court applied legally incorrect standards in determining the existence of racially polarized voting and vote dilution.

In identifying Latino voters' preferred candidates, the court focused on the ethnicity of candidates, rather than the preferences of Latino voters, Boutrous said. It also ignored that Latino-preferred candidates usually win City Council elections and assumed that Latino voters prefer only Latino-surnamed candidates, he added.

"We are looking forward to the Court of Appeal taking a fresh look at this case," Boutrous said. "The trial court improperly rubber-stamped the plaintiffs' misguided and unsupported view of the law, ignored the history of Santa Monica's election system and the success of minority-preferred candidates in that system, deprived the electorate of any public process for the districts drawn, and violated the federal and California Constitutions."

The brief asserts that the trial court's chosen remedy — compelling the City to conduct elections using a seven-district map drawn by respondents' expert — violates section 10010 of the Elections Code, which requires a democratic process, including public hearings, on districting before any "court-imposed change from an at-large method of election to a district-based election" takes effect.

File graphic
CVRA: The plaintiffs provided a seven-district election map.

"No such hearings have taken place in Santa Monica — a result inconsistent with the democratic process called for by the statute," Boutrous said. "Residents have been deprived of their opportunity to provide input into the new electoral system."

In the trial court's statement of decision, Judge Yvette Palazuelos said the city had almost three years while the case was pending to hold a public input process to determine district borders. She also wrote that the city could have held that process as late as November of last year, when she issued her tentative judgment in the case.

The plaintiff's attorney Kevin Shenkman said the argument that the court should have analyzed Latino-preferred candidates instead of Latino candidates goes against the precedent set by the Supreme Court and California courts in determining the existence of racially polarized voting.

"When Latino voters favor Latino candidates and they lose, that's racially polarized voting," Shenkman said.

He said the plaintiffs will file a brief in response to the city's opening brief within 40 days, although he said they might ask for a brief extension.

Online ordering boom gives rise to virtual restaurants

BY ALEXANDRA OLSON
AP Business Writer

NEW YORK (AP) — Frato's Pizza looks like a typical family restaurant, with its black-and-white checkered floor and red chairs. But in the kitchen, the cooks are whipping up dishes for four other restaurants at the same time.

There is, of course, the gourmet pizza that patrons have come to expect from Frato's when they walk through the door. But there are also spicy chicken gyros for Halal Kitchen, barbecue chicken tenders for Tenderlicious, salmon grilled cheese for Cheesy Deliciousness, and Butterfinger milkshakes for Heavenly Shakes — all of which can only be ordered through online sites Grubhub, DoorDash and Uber Eats.

Owner Michael Kudrna launched the four spinoffs earlier this year in a matter of weeks as he races to keep his Chicago-area business ahead of a growing trend: restaurants conceived only for delivery or take-out.

Thousands of restaurants are experimenting with these virtual spinoffs tucked inside their own kitchens. Others are opening "ghost kitchens," where all food is prepared to-go.

Both concepts have emerged to capitalize on the rising popularity of ordering in instead of dining out. The trend also speaks to the growing power of third-party delivery companies, which have transformed the way many people find restaurants and raised expectations for speed and convenience.

The $26.8 billion online ordering market is the fastest-growing source of restaurant sales in the United States, according to David Portalatin, a food industry adviser for the NPD group. Digital orders, while still accounting for just 5% of all restaurant orders, are growing some 20% each year. Restaurant visits, meanwhile, remain mostly flat.

Kudrna says the virtual restaurants are a way to gain enough incremental revenue to offset the fees he pays to the third-party apps, which now drive one-third of his sales. Restaurants pay commission fees as high as 30% per order.

"The beauty is I can create concepts and if they don't work, I can move on to try another one," Kudrna said. "I will have lost weeks of work, but not large sums of money."

Chick-Fil-A, The Halal Guys and Dog Haus are among top brands that have opened ghost kitchens through Kitchen United, a start-up that builds kitchen commissaries for restaurants looking to enter new markets through delivery or take-out only.

Kitchen United, backed by $50 million in funding from Google Ventures and other investors, has two locations in Pasadena, California, and Chicago. It has ambitious expansion plans to open 40 more kitchens in cities across the U.S. through 2020, said CEO Jim Collins.

DoorDash staked a claim to the trend last week. The delivery company partnered with four restaurant chains — including The Halal Guys — to open a bright red shared kitchen in Redwood City, California, offering delivery or pick-up in 13 suburban Bay Area markets.

The idea is for DoorDash Kitchens to be a one-stop shop for restaurants looking to grow their business, said Fuad Hannon, head of new business verticals at DoorDash, although there are no immediate plans to expand.

"We are really at the early innings of this industry," Hannon said. "It's highly speculative at this point to understand where this will all go but what we know is that people love to get their favorite restaurants delivered."

There have already been some notable failures. Maple, the delivery-only restaurant backed by celebrity chef David Chang, closed in New York in 2017 after two years. Pilotworks, a venture capital-backed start-up that offered commercial kitchen space and distribution services for small food businesses, abruptly closed its Brooklyn commissary in 2018, leaving nearly 200 vendors in the lurch with no warning.

"I had to call all of these businesses and tell them I didn't have a kitchen. It was awful," said Liz Santiso, owner of Brooklyn Biscuit Company, who is starting over after losing her wholesale business that had delivered to Whole Foods and Dean & Deluca.

Both Kitchen United and DoorDash are staking their shared-kitchen models on helping successful restaurants grow, rather than serving as incubators for start-ups.

Grubhub and Uber Eats say their virtual restaurant programs help small businesses compete in this landscape. Both actively reach out to restaurants with suggestions for online spinoffs based on data gleaned from customer searches — extending their influence from how people get their food to what should go on the menu.

Uber Eats has helped launch 4,000 such virtual restaurants worldwide, about half of them in the U.S. and Canada, according to Kristen Adamowski, head of Uber's virtual restaurants program.

One restaurant owner, Rick Scott, said Uber saved his Brooklyn business. Scott first opened a cafe serving coffee, pastries and ice cream in Crown Heights, a lower-income neighborhood. But it was the only sit-in restaurant for blocks around and "the neighborhood just wasn't ready for it," Scott said.

Sales were slumping when he reached out Uber, which told him there was latent demand for specialty burgers in the surrounding area. Scott launched Gerizim Burger Factory on Uber Eats with a Caribbean-inspired menu of jerk and calypso burgers.

Almost immediately, he said, sales jumped about 75%. A year later, he has two employees, rebranded his physical restaurant and launched a second Burger Factory in the borough of Queens.

"It was a 90-degree turnaround," Scott said. "It changed our whole business."

But Kudrna has found he can't always rely on third-party suggestions. Heavenly Sweets, a desert concept suggested by Grubhub, has mostly flopped. The chefs at a training program he runs then came up with Cheesy Deliciousness and Halal Kitchen, which have so far taken off.

Grubhub spokeswoman Katie Norris said sales representatives suggest virtual spinoff ideas when they see untapped demand for a cuisine in a market, but it's up to the restaurant to decide whether it makes sense for them.

Virtual restaurants have the obvious benefit of testing new concepts without taking on expensive leases or hiring more staff, said Rick Carmac, dean of restaurant management at the Institute of Culinary Education in New York.

But he said small restaurants should weigh risks before embarking on an online spinoff at the behest of third-party platforms, which offer no training for kitchen staff to adjust to new menus. Restaurants should consider whether their delivery packaging is right for new dishes, or whether they want to increase their reliance on outside delivery drivers.

"None of those things are minute, and none of those things easy, which is kind of what you might be led to believe," said Carmac, who has consulted for Uber Eats and said he expressed his reservations about the company's approach. "They give you the data, and then they leave."

TODAY'S BIRTHDAY (OCTOBER 22)

How many ways are there to be a good person? Endless. You'll come up with at least a dozen before the New Year's Eve ball drops. Stay open-minded. Goodness isn't always synonymous with appropriateness or amenability. As you follow your heart's desire without worrying about much else, goodness happens. Pisces and Scorpio adore you. Your lucky numbers are: 8, 19, 33, 28 and 50.

ARIES (March 21-April 19). While you can't exactly travel to happiness, some places are generally happier than others, increasing the odds of finding enjoyment and contentment. And the good feeling will probably land while in transit to such a place.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20). You'll put your head down and do your job, undistracted, undeterred, no matter who notices or doesn't. This is why you are the biggest producer and will continue to be in demand.

GEMINI (May 21-June 21). When you're a good person to the right people, it doesn't feel like anything, because that's the norm, just as it should be. To do right by the wrong people is harder, more important and never regrettable.

CANCER (June 22-July 22). That thing you keep thinking about is not going away. Your mind will keep wrapping around and around it until the rest of you follows through with some action. There's an experience that wants to be had.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22). You certainly don't need anyone else to make your life interesting. You're quite adept at doing that on your own. However, a charismatic character is coming into your world -- fun ensues.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22). Thinking too much can be worse than negative thinking insomuch that it usually ends up negatively anyway and just takes longer to get there. What will stop the downward thought spiral? Action.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 23). There's not much good that can come of overidentifying with ideas about yourself, opinions about the world or beliefs about your place in it. Take a breath, and take the sophisticated stance -- everything is a "maybe."

SCORPIO (Oct. 24-Nov. 21). You're keenly observant and so in the moment today. This is why you're able to capture the beauty, get privy to the inside info, catch the jokes and invest with great timing.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21). You are working with others for a wondrous result, though, curiously, you don't yet know who you're working with and what the result will be. Keep doing your thing. The paths will soon converge.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19). From where you're sitting, the borders are much easier to make out than the possibilities. That makes your job of seeing the possibilities and only the possibilities a little more challenging yet still utterly doable.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18). When everyone in the room is new and doesn't know what to expect, congratulations. You've entered the ideal circumstance. There is nothing more exciting than a room full of strangers.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20). Those who are running from responsibility may simply be ill-informed about the joys of running toward it. Don't take their dodge as a personal slight. Instead, show the way via example.

Venus Redefines Stress

The tense angle of the Leo moon to Venus defines stress as wanting to be somewhere other than where you are. Stress elimination is simply finding a way to love where you are. It probably requires that you let go of something: an idea about yourself, a score you want to settle, a bit of angry baggage... open your hands and drop it.

HALLOWEEN PANTHEON

MUMMIES: The ancient alien theorists suggest that Egyptians developed the mummification process in order to save specimens on Earth so they may one day, with advances in DNA technology, be reanimated as clones "Jurassic Park"-style. Most others believe that mummification was just one of the many rituals ancient Egyptians practiced to have a good afterlife. Both theories bring up questions: When does this rich afterlife ensue in theory? Because thousands of years later, it still seems like a pretty flat scene. And what sort of hobbies might a reanimated ancient Egyptian enjoy in, say, 2080, when most lives will be lived virtually anyway... will we even need a body anymore? Anyone who's ever pondered an actual mummy, say, in a museum or curio shop, understands firsthand the creepiness of coming face to face with mortality -- or immortality, depending on how you look at it. Metaphorically the mummy recalls any area of life (emotional, professional, relational, ideological...) we wish weren't dead but most probably is. It's regret, loss, desperation and mourning that are hard (if not terrifying) to face and let go of because there's something oddly fascinating about the preservation of what was once so vitally, uniquely alive.

COUPLE OF THE WEEKEND

Physician and author Deepak Chopra is among the biggest celebrities of the New Age movement. Whether he's debating with the world's top scientists, discussing the afterlife with spiritual leaders or hanging out with Lady Gaga, this Libran guru (with natal moon in Libra, too) brings a spark of air-sign intellect and a breath of fresh levity to the subject of enlightenment. Write Holiday Mathis at HolidayMathis.com.

CRIME WATCH

BY DAILY PRESS STAFF

Crime Watch is culled from reports provided by the Santa Monica Police Department. These are arrests only. All parties are innocent until proven guilty in a court of law.

ON MAY 25 AT 2 A.M.

Suspects were seen going into an apartment complex in the 400 block of San Vicente and taking several packages from the mailroom. The suspects' actions were caught on CCTV. Detectives were able to identify the suspects and placed a want in the system for the suspects. On Oct. 9, Santa Monica detectives were notified that one of the suspects was being detained by the LAPD. The suspect was brought to the Santa Monica Police Department Jail for processing. Brenda Renee Green, 54, of Chatsworth, was booked for burglary. Her bail was set at $50,000.

calm and orderly manner due to both potential fire and smoke behavior as well as the pending arrival of large fixed-wind retardant dropping aircraft. LAFD asked evacuating residents to notify their neighbors of the order and offer what evacuation assistance they can to neighbors who have mobility or functional needs.

An evacuation center has been set up at Palisades Recreation Center, according to LAFD.

Officials said at a press conference that they do not yet know the cause of the fire. Santa Ana winds were expected to sweep the area on Monday, but officials said wind did not play a role in spreading the blaze.

LAFD chief Anthony Marrone said firefighters will continue to battle the fire throughout the night and will ensure that the area is not susceptible to ignition when high winds blow into the area Thursday.

"Folks can get a false sense of security," assistant chief Patrick Butler said at the press conference. "The weather can change around here … and the area is ripe for wildfires. So, when we initiate an evacuation in area, it's not so much … for what you see in front of you, but what they can anticipate."

ARREST

1:20 p.m. as a group of President Donald Trump supporters argued with and then started fighting with anti-Trump protesters who had marched onto the Pier after holding a rally on the beach calling for Trump and Vice President Mike Pence to be driven from office.

A YouTube video shows Dempsey, wearing a red "Make America Great Again" hat, spraying protesters with pepper spray intended as bear repellent and at one point spraying a man lying on the ground in the face. The Associated Press reported that another Trump supporter also sprayed protesters with pepper spray.

The video shows Dempsey telling police officers that he didn't do anything wrong and claiming the protesters attacked him.

"It's these f— libtards over here, these commies," he said. "I didn't do anything."

County records show Dempsey was previously convicted of burglary in 2006 and 2009 and of larceny and conspiracy in 2012. He is being held without bond and is scheduled to appear in Los Angeles Superior Court for an arraignment hearing on Tuesday.

Cobarrubias said officers detained Dempsey and paramedics provided medical aid to protesters and non-involved Pier patrons affected by the bear repellent.

"Protesters from both groups dispersed after the incident but were monitored by officers in the event another escalation started," Cobarrubias said. "No further incidents occurred."

The leftist anti-Trump group Refuse Fascism planned the Saturday protest as part of its pro-impeachment campaign, "Out Now," said Refuse Fascism Los Angeles organizer Chantelle Hershberger. The group held a similar protest in New York City on Saturday in front of Trump Tower.

Hershberger said Refuse Fascism spelled out "Trump Pence Out Now" with fabric stretching 100 yards down Santa Monica State Beach south of the Pier. She said the group held a rally for about half an hour before marching onto the Pier to perform a die-in for the victims of an August mass shooting in El Paso carried out by a white nationalist and migrants who have died in American immigrant detention centers.

Trump supporters began circling the protesters as they lay on the Pier and tried to antagonize them, Hershberger said. They then started pushing the protesters, and Dempsey and another man sprayed protesters with pepper spray. They targeted Refuse Fascism's leadership, she said.

"The people they got were people they know as leadership because they follow our social media pages and our protests," Hershberger said.

She added that Refuse Fascism received screenshots of the attackers' social media posts that indicated they were planning to violently disrupt the protest.

"People who are friends with them who are Trump supporters but don't condone violence sent screenshots of their social media posts as a warning to us," she said. "One post said, "bring your mace, bring your bats"."

Hershberger said Trump supporters have been emboldened by his rhetoric to attack anti-Trump protesters. Refuse Fascism will continue its "Out Now" campaign nationwide, she added.

"A key component of fascism consolidating is these kinds of mobs intimidating people out of expressing dissent in the streets," she said. "This attack shows why more people need to be nonviolently protesting in the streets to drive this regime from power."

ILLNESS

In the end, it wasn't the synthetic marijuana compound in Yolo from Utah that caught up with Thompson. It was another kind of synthetic added to different brands.

By the time of the Utah poisonings, vapes labeled as Black Magic and Black Diamond had sickened more than 40 people in North Carolina, including high school students and military service members. Investigators were able to connect Thompson to that outbreak in part based on a guilty plea from the distributor of the spiked vapes, who said a woman that authorities identified as Thompson supplied the liquid that went into them.

Prosecutors also linked her to dealers charged in New York, where she pleaded guilty last month to conspiracy to distribute synthetic marijuana and a money laundering charge. The only brand federal prosecutors cited was Yolo.

U.S. Attorney Geoffrey Berman called Thompson a "drug trafficker" who used JK Wholesale to distribute "massive quantities" of synthetic marijuana as far back as 2014. She faces up to 40 years in prison.

Reached by phone the week before she pleaded guilty, Thompson declined to discuss Yolo and then hung up. In a subsequent text message, Thompson said not to call her and referred questions to her lawyer, who did not respond to requests for comment.

While Yolo was Thompson's project and she was the exclusive salesperson, her business partner and former roommate was involved in its production, according to the workplace retaliation complaint.

Thompson's business partner and former roommate, Katarina Maloney, distanced herself from Thompson and Yolo during an August interview at Mathco's headquarters in Carlsbad, California. Maloney has not been charged in the federal investigation.

"To tell you the truth, that was my business partner," Maloney said of Yolo. She said Thompson was no longer her partner and she didn't want to discuss it.

In a follow-up email, Maloney asserted the Yolo in Utah "was not purchased from us," without elaborating.

"Mathco Health Corporation or any of its subsidiary companies do not engage in the manufacture or sale of illegal products," she wrote. "When products leave our facility, they are 100% compliant with all laws."

Maloney also said all products are lab tested. She did not respond to requests for Yolo lab results.

This version corrects the name of the agency that received the tip, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, not U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency.
