NEWS OF THE WEIRD

BY CHUCK SHEPARD

Once again, housekeepers at a museum mistook part of an art installation for ordinary garbage and tossed it out (this time, a bag of newspapers that was part of Gustav Metzger's "Re-creation of First Public Demonstration of Auto-Destructive Art" at London's Tate Britain gallery, in August). And once again, a suicidal man leaped to his death off a building but landed on a pedestrian, killing him, too (this time, in Nishinomiya, Hyogo, Japan, in August).

TODAY IN HISTORY

ONE-HUNDRED-FIFTY YEARS AGO, on Oct. 25, 1854, the "Charge of the Light Brigade" took place during the Crimean War as an English brigade of more than 600 men, facing hopeless odds, charged the Russian army in the Battle of Balaclava and suffered heavy losses.
ONE YEAR AGO: To chants of "Impeach Bush," thousands of anti-war protesters rallied in the nation's capital and delivered a scathing critique of President Bush and his Iraq policy.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

The golden years: Retiree pieces together her life's events

BY PAM WIGHT

Special to the Daily Press

FIFTH STREET — For most 74-year-old retirees, joining the Peace Corps is not on their list of plans. But Trudi Wyner wanted to help people. So rather than volunteering at the local hospital or charity with her peers, she signed up for a two-year adventure in Jamaica.

That was in 1990. And Wyner's choice to help people in a tiny, developing island country was not the first courageous move the Santa Monica resident had made. But she was not always so bold.

"People don't believe me, but I used to be so mousy," said the petite 87-year-old. "I didn't stand up for myself at all, and I was very quiet."

Having lived most of her life in Cleveland, Wyner set off for California by herself when she was 61 years old. She sought a fresh start and an escape from what she called "overbearing siblings." Her husband had divorced her 20 years earlier, leaving her to raise four children alone.

TRUDI WYNER

A self-described lifelong learner, Wyner attended night school since she was a teenager as a hobby, dabbling in a variety of subjects. But her dream

Shriver leads City Council challengers with $162K raised

He's out-raised his opponents by nearly $100,000

BY JOHN WOOD

Daily Press Staff Writer

CITY HALL — A handful of challengers hoping to win one of four open seats on the Santa Monica City Council this November stepped up fundraising efforts in the first half of October and netted tens of thousands of dollars in donations, reports filed at City Hall last week show.

Seventeen-year resident Bobby Shriver raised $57,000 in the first two weeks of the month. This pushed his fundraising total to more than $162,000 — nearly $100,000 more than any of his opponents. The second highest fundraiser is incumbent Herb Katz, who has amassed about $73,000 in campaign contributions.

For the first half of October, physician Matt Dinolfo and former school board president Patricia Hoffman both brought in more than $10,000, according to documents.

The donations came in checks of $250 or less. By law, local candidates aren't allowed to accept larger contributions, and they must regularly report where their money comes from and how it's spent. With the election eight days away, candidates now must report within 24 hours any contributions and expenses.

Several Hollywood luminaries were among those who donated to Shriver, a Kennedy family descendant who has relied upon family and personal connections across the country to beef up his campaign war chest. Included in the recent batch of donors were actors Warren Beatty, Annette Bening, Mel Brooks and Robert DeNiro. Singers Neil Diamond and Jon Bon Jovi also contributed to Shriver this month, as did Motown legend Barry Gordy.

Expenses also played a prominent role in the Shriver campaign. Shriver racked up nearly $83,000 in bills during the first two weeks of the month on mailers, legal counsel, an election fundraiser and a variety of campaign consultants, documents show.

Following Shriver in the fundraising race was Dinolfo, who reported netting $13,300, pushing his campaigning total to more than $50,000. Dinolfo's contributions came from, among others, City Councilman

Luxury hotels pump $170K into local election campaign

BY JOHN WOOD

CITY HALL — Two Santa Monica luxury beachfront hotels opened their wallets this month in an effort to sway voters before next week's election, financial disclosure reports indicate.

Owners of Casa Del Mar and Shutters on the Beach, where room rates range from a few hundred dollars to several thousand dollars a night, contributed $170,000 to an independent political group pushing four candidates also endorsed by the local chamber of commerce.

Both hotels have battled city officials for years over their efforts to implement a living wage in Santa Monica, where non-unionized large businesses near the beach would have been

Halloween party benefits AIDS victims

By Daily Press staff

Looking for a scary good time?

Come meet celebrities, trick-or-treat, eat food, meet cartoon characters and more, all while helping feed and clothe kids with AIDS.

Jamie Lee Curtis will host the 11th Annual Dream Halloween Fundraiser of the Children Affected by AIDS Foundation (CAAF). Other stars at the event will include Doris Roberts, Ray Romano and Daryl Sabara. Elizabeth Taylor will receive the "Celebrity Hero Award."

The fundraiser is open to the public, and families are invited to come in costume to enjoy meeting their favorite cartoon characters, play games, and create arts and crafts. Tickets are $300 for adults and $250 for children. All proceeds go to the daily needs of children who are affected by AIDS.

The annual event has generated funds to help AIDS patients for more than a decade.

"Seeing the joy in the faces of the children we have aided is the fuel that keeps me going. And as our signature fundraising event, Dream Halloween is the major source of funds behind the $16 million that we have raised to help kids in need during the past 11 years," said Joe Cristina, founder and board chairperson of CAAF.

CAAF grants range from $2,000 to $25,000 and are made to non-profit agencies to assist children with AIDS in the areas of food, transportation, clothing, medical and mental health care and more.

The event will take place on Saturday, Oct. 30 at the Barker Hangar at the Santa Monica Airport from 5 p.m. to 9 p.m. For tickets and information, call Lauran Huff at (310) 201-5033.

Fairy tales and magic wands

By Daily Press staff

If goblins and ghouls are too ghastly for your tender heart, perhaps a land of magic is the place to visit for Halloween.

Unlike traditional haunted houses, the Halloween Enchantment Festival put on by the Westside Waldorf School offers a gentler experience, based on a combination of harvest celebrations and fairy tales.

Children of all ages are guided by an angel through classrooms that have been transformed into magical realms. Advance tickets are available at wswaldorf.org. A limited number of tickets will also be sold at the door.

The annual Halloween Enchantment Festival will be held on Oct. 30 from 5 p.m. to 9 p.m. Westside Waldorf School is located at 1229 Fourth St. For more information call, (310) 576-0788.

SMC professor awarded fellowship

By Daily Press Staff

Santa Monica College art professor Anne Marie Karlsen has been awarded a fellowship by the Virginia Center for Creative Arts, where she'll spend three weeks in the countryside in the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains pursuing new artwork early next year.

Karlsen, a Westchester resident, will be among approximately 20 fellows at the working retreat for visual artists, writers and composers in Amherst, Va.

It will be the second time Karlsen has won a fellowship to the center, and she plans to spend late January and early February working on a project that combines watercolor painting with digital images, based on photos she took on a recent trip to Norway.

Karlsen's work has been in the public collections of the Brooklyn Museum, the Fogg Art Museum, the Milwaukee Art Museum, the Carnegie Museum of Art and the Lannan Foundation, among others. She was commissioned to create the artwork at the North Hollywood Red Line Metro station and to create a hand-sculpted, ceramic water feature at Paseo Colorado in Pasadena.

Karlsen has been teaching at SMC since 1986.

SURF REPORT

On Monday look for a small mix of slightly increased NW wind swell and small SW swell. Northern LA spots work the swell mix for inconsistent knee-high surf at many spots with occasional waist-high sets at top spots. South Bay spots are below waist high for the most part, with a few waist-high sets at best NW/combo breaks. Light and variable to light onshore wind expected in the morning, building WNW 8-15 knots for the afternoon.

Today the water is:

With the election only days away, most people have decided on who they will vote for as president. Because California has skirted most of the campaign rhetoric that most states have seen through slanted television ads, most Santa Monicans have been spared the spin coming from both President Bush and Sen. Kerry.

It's still anybody's race. However, with the electoral college vote system, it appears Bush might win the election, despite majorities for Kerry elsewhere

This week, Q-Line wants to know, "Do you agree with the electoral college vote system? Why or why not?"

Call (310) 285-8106 before Friday at 5 p.m. and we'll print your responses in the weekend edition. Please limit your comments to a minute or less. It might be helpful to first think about the wording of your response.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Ed, the Bush basher

Editor:

Re: Incites hatred filled article (SMDP, Oct. 20, page 4).
After laying out his premise that only people who are bigoted and ignorant resort to name-calling, Ed made it 23 words before calling Bush an “inveterate liar that has sold out this country to corporate interests and religious extremists.”
Honestly, I’m not even sure what “inveterate liar” means. But I’m sure that’s what Mensa kids call other Mensa kids on the playground.
Ed, you seem surprised that you yourself are labeled “Anti-Christian.” Do you actually read your articles?
Allow me to quote you from your Jan. 21 Incites on faith-based organizations. “Potential recipients of our taxes are churches which have tried to erect statues to celebrate the beating death of a gay man.” Really, Ed. Name one mainstream church in the United States that has tried to erect such a statue, and I will help organize other churches to go to protest.
Almost every article has some slam on Christians. Remember all the chicken little stuff you said about Mel’s “The Passion of the Christ?”
If only you were anonymous I could suggest that you start A.C.A. (Anti-Christians Anonymous.) Hello, my name is Ed. It has been 21 days and three articles since I linked the words religious and extremist together.
Actually, it’s worth a try Ed. I challenge you to see how many articles you can write that don’t refer to Christians in some negative light. Or better yet, since you must have pretty much exhausted the negative side, write an article on the good Christians have done.

Future not bright for lumber yard

Editor:

The Fisher Lumber site will be turned into a park. Why bother? The city officials will only let it get taken over by the bums, like the city’s other parks. Fisher Lumber serves a more useful purpose to the area than any bum infested park would. Santa Monica likes to control how others use their own money and property. They should do something useful for once and force Fisher lumber to remain in business.

SMC receives failing grade from student

Editor:

I took a few classes at SMC as prerequisites for grad school. I had trouble understanding an instructor, so I went to the disabilities center. First, they required me to sign over rights allowing them to share my medical information with various agencies, which is illegal. Then the woman told me SMC is not required to do anything at all for disabled adults, which is not true.
What I asked for was a seat in the front because the class was so packed. She told me that this is my burden, which is the opposite of the law. They did contact the instructor, but this only caused more problems because their information is wrong. The next day in front of the whole class the instructor said she was going to treat me “the same as everyone else.” I was one of the only white male students in the class. I have a letter from SMC indicating that the instructor admitted using those words, which were a refusal to comply with the law, but SMC backed her up.
I was afraid to do anything else during the class, but ultimately was unhappy with my grade. When I complained, I ran into a series of women who shuffled me from one to another. In the disabilities office alone there are pictures of 22 female employees (now there is one male). They appear to have no understanding in disabilities but are obsessed with women’s rights, their own anyway. What they consider most important is that I refer to them as professor or doctor, even as they are mostly doctors of education.
SMC offers almost no information regarding disabilities. Looking in the Internet archive, they had this information on their Web site but removed it.
They added something recently, but it does not comply with the law. Rather than stating the services they offer instead it states that they are required to offer no services. Under federal, state and even Santa Monica law they must make accommodations, or they can lose funding.
Every time SMC hires another woman the press release states that this is a gain for women’s rights, but it’s illegal to hire based on sex. There has been a lot of controversy over programs that were cut, but it is rarely mentioned that SMC created a women’s college just a few months before those cuts. Such a college at a community college is unique.
Many of the students at SMC are international. SMC is allowed to keep their tuition, which is higher and can be used by whatever the administration chooses, including their salaries, but it doesn’t cover things like bonds.
SMC advertises extensively for these students, and it is obvious that they favor these students over the disabled, which violates several laws.
SMC praises itself for their transfer rate, but much of it comes from international students that use SMC to improve their English. California has the most lenient residency requirement in the country, so it only takes one year and they’re residents. Meanwhile it is difficult to gain access not only to UC but also Cal-State. At CSUN they now restrict access to those who live in the valley, while they still recruit foreign students. SMC transfers need not apply.

There’s a lot to ponder in the ballot box this year

COMMON
BY CAROLE ORLIN

(Editor’s note: This is the first column in a two-part series on Campaign 2004. On Monday, Nov. 1, Carole will examine local City Council candidates).

The countdown to Election day is now in single digits. One week from Tuesday will mark the date that finally allows us to go to the polls and mark our ballots. Has it really been four years since those “hanging chads?” In looking at the official sample ballot for those of us in Santa Monica, it appears less daunting than I had imagined. We have to mark our choice for: President and Vice President of the United States; U.S. Senator; U.S. Representative; State Senator; State Assembly Member; five Judges of the Superior Court. This is followed by a “yes” or “no” vote on 16 state measures and one county measure. Then, we have our city of Santa Monica choices for: four members of the City Council; two Rent Control Board members; two Santa Monica College Trustees; three school board members; and two “yes” or “no” votes for two propositions. That’s it. Vote on Nov. 2 and go home and watch the election returns.

Because of space limitations, and the limits on a person’s attention span after being bombarded on TV and radio with political ads, political debates, political “spin” commentaries ad nauseum, daily political mailers and phone calls, I decided to make a brief comment on the presidential election and to focus on a more extensive look at one of our local races, the City Council race.

At this point I believe that everyone who has actually decided to vote on Nov. 2 has made up his or her mind whether or not it will be Bush or Kerry. Based upon what happened in the 2000 election and the myriad of pre-election voter polls, the decision for president appears to be extremely close. I don’t think anyone will be surprised if the electoral votes in a number of key states — like Florida in 2000 — will be contested after Election Day and ultimately thrown into the courts of those states, thereby delaying the determination of who won and who lost. It could be déjà vu all over again.

That brings me to repeat an argument that I made in this column about a month ago.

Local elections — like ours in Santa Monica — usually have greater significance on our quality of life, impacting directly on our day-to-day standards of living and working, than which candidate wins the presidency. Since I do believe this to be the case, I would urge you to carefully consider your four selections for our City Council. Unlike the race for president, I suspect there are many of you who have not made up your mind as to which of the 14 candidates listed on the ballot you will actually select. Perhaps this is because of the large number of candidates running. Perhaps this is because of the number of formal and informal political groups that have issued endorsements for one group of four candidates or another group of four different (or even partial overlapping) candidates. Perhaps your indecision is the result of not being able to clearly differentiate among the candidates on their true political views on issues that you see as most important to the future of Santa Monica. Here is my partial list of issues that concern my household: vagrancy — dealing effectively with the homeless; education — providing for quality public schools; public safety; traffic and parking; residential housing — balance between owners and landlords and tenants; business development policies; Santa Monica’s role in providing services to its residents and effectively managing its affairs; recreational facilities and environmental health standards.

You might have carefully read the various articles that have appeared in the Santa Monica Daily Press over the last couple of months and carefully reviewed the responses of the candidates on some of these issues. You might have attended one or more public forums and heard answers to some of your important questions. You might personally know one or more of the candidates for City Council and have satisfied yourself as to whether or not he/she should receive your vote.

However, you might find that none of the above applies to you, and that you, therefore, have no idea how to cast your ballot. Do not despair. Next week, I will present a possible solution to this dilemma. I will discuss the four incumbents who are all seeking reelection; the slate of four candidates endorsed by the Santa Monicans for Renters’ Rights (SMRR); the slate of four candidates endorsed by the Chamber of Commerce; and the other candidates seeking to be in the top four vote-getters, along with a variety of other endorsements from other Santa Monica groups and individuals. We will look at the interesting notion of how your votes might or might not aid in accomplishing your desired goal of maintaining the status quo or effectuating change. Finally, in the spirit of this campaign, I will be giving you my own campaign pledge.

The world's suffering on an average morning

HIP TO BE SQUARE

BY CAROLINE BODKIN

People suffer. Every day, in every corner of the world, people of every color and creed, and from every tax bracket are suffering.

This is not big news.

We consider suffering part of the human existence. If we didn't, we'd wake up every day overwhelmed by the great suffering in the world. And we don't do that.

For the most part, we wake up and brush our teeth, shower, dress and make our ways in the world. We go to work, we pick up groceries and we climb onto StairMasters or cook chicken breasts for dinner. We read fiction.

But even though suffering exists everywhere, at all times, it is foreign to each of us until it is our turn to face it. And we all face it.

We will all watch a loved one die, we will all mourn a loss, and when we do, we will all wonder whether or not it's something we can handle.

What happens when it's your turn? What happens when you are the one to wake up on that random weekday morning, knowing that as you face the world on that day, you will be carrying a giant weight of emotions and grief, worry, distress?

This is not happening to me right now. This is happening to someone I love. He woke up this morning, two states away, to an overwhelming amount of suffering after having lost a loved family member the night before.

For him, the living world of yesterday included a person he loved, and today it does not. And that seemingly minor change in our world (one less person out of billions) is a dramatic change to his.

He will spend today going about his life. He is not with his family, the other people in the world who feel the way he does.

So I wonder, does he feel alone?

Will anyone whom he encounters today be able to see the weight of grief and sadness he is carrying?

I've heard people say that they wish to suffer in private. It's as though their grief were a tender piece of meat, wrapped in paper and received wordlessly at the clear glass counter, then brought quietly home where they can tend to it in solitude.

Some people do this because it's the way they are, and others do this because they have no one with whom to share their grief. The former, I suppose, I understand; but the latter, I think, is so sad.

If suffering is part of the human existence, how can we not feel surrounded by understanding and compassion when we grieve? If each of us faces suffering at some point, how is it possible we could feel so alone when it's our turn?

My friend is not alone. He suffers along with his family — the members of which are spread across the country. They all feel the same loss, though they do so in different places. In this sense, he has company.

I think of him and his family today, at home in the morning brushing their teeth or trying to make coffee.

I think of them in their cars, driving to work, talking to coworkers, writing e-mails about projects and proposals, or back at home, focusing on the preparation of food. I think of them going about their days, doing the normal things, while suffering.

I wonder which of the friends, which people that surround them, know what they are facing.

As for my friend, I wish he had woken up in a home surrounded by the people who share his grief. I wish he'd had company, not in the theoretical sense, but actual, physical company. I know there will be phone calls made and e-mails exchanged between them all about the sadness and the moving on. I know he knows he's not alone. But I worry that he feels that way.

It seems to me that if a person chooses to, they could endure sadness by themselves, even though each of us, any of us, if we thought to, could look at them, listen to them, hold them and share it.

was to be an artist.

"I had gone to night school at the Cleveland School of Art," Wyner said. "I'd work all day and go to school at night. Then they passed a rule that there would be no nighttime or part-time classes anymore for anybody but full-timers. So I attacked it from a different angle by going to all of the museum's art appreciation classes."

Once her youngest son left for college, Wyner sold the family house, paid off her children's student loans and earned a BA in communications at age 57 from Cleveland State University. She had been enrolled in higher education since the 1930s.

"One of my sisters told me I'd better take commercial-type courses instead of art courses so I could get a job," she said. "The Depression was going on then. I was always upset that I couldn't go into the arts, but I had to support myself."

With all of her children grown, Wyner's original plan was to go to Florida. But one of her older sisters was moving to San Diego and talked her into going there instead. One summer shortly thereafter, she took a job house-sitting in Los Angeles and fell in love with the city. Soon she had an apartment in the Fairfax district and was working as a substitute teacher in Los Angeles Unified School District high schools.

But a decade later, Wyner had to move to Houston to help her daughter-in-law, who was experiencing prolonged postpartum depression. She remained there for three years. While taking an art history course at the local college, she and a classmate commiserated over their dislike for Houston. The friend gave Wyner the phone number for the Peace Corps.

"The Peace Corps was on my mind because I was thinking of all of these things that I could do," Wyner said. "I've always been interested in other people. I keep a pile of cards on which I've typed philosophical sayings from different people to help motivate me."

Getting accepted to the Peace Corps was no easy task. After a partial interview in which they tried to talk Wyner out of joining, they sent her a lengthy application.

"First they try to discourage you, because they think you're just inquiring and not interested enough to do it," she said. "Then they ask for references from eight people who know you quite well. They're very strict."

Wyner wanted to go to Africa. She had studied French and requested an assignment in any French-speaking country on the continent. A year later there was still no response to Wyner's application. Frustrated with the delays, Wyner finally called and asked.

"They said, 'Well if you want to go, we have a group going to Jamaica,' and I thought, I better go while the gettin's good."

So at 74 years old, she set off alone for the Caribbean nation of Jamaica, to live as a local in the rural community of Brownstown, 20 miles from Jamaica's capital city of Kingston.

Wyner talked to the Daily Press in her apartment on Fifth Street in downtown Santa Monica.

What made you want to join the Peace Corps?

"I always admired people who helped others. I didn't have an exact plan. I mean, I didn't even know what volunteer organization to join, whether I'd help kids learn to read or some little thing. But I wanted to move away from Houston, and it seemed like the time was right for me. Then my classmate at the school I was attending gave me the phone number, so I called them. The Peace Corps needed

Age: 87, will be 88 on Halloween.

Hobbies: Reading, going to the symphony and the art museum, writing.

Education: BA in communications from Cleveland State University, some post-graduate work in accounting and teaching credentials from John Carroll University.

Family: Four grown children: three sons, one daughter; a sister, 93, living in Westwood who she visits every week.

Residence: Salvation Army residence for seniors in Santa Monica.

people who could teach a craft or help build houses. Even though I had an education didn't mean I had the type of skill they needed."

How did you get accepted?

"I had been a teacher, so that's what they used. Although they didn't want you to teach in the country per se, having some teaching experience helped me. And I knew a lot of other things. They kept sending the application back asking what else I could do. Do you know anything about quilting? Planting? I'd check off the things I was sort of familiar with. Then they'd ask for more details. They'd finally zoom in on something."

"For example, one man said he once learned something about bee keeping. I mean, enough to fill a thimble, and they took him. So he did some research, and now he still lives in Jamaica teaching farmers how to make their own hives. He loved it."

"You see, it works something like an employment agency. The Peace Corps gets requests from different countries for a certain type of skill, and they look to see what skills they have listed, and pass you on."

What was your experience like?

"I was there for two years, and I was placed in a school in Brownstown, which was out in the country — I call it the bush. It was a school for girls who had been kicked out of regular school because they were pregnant. In Jamaica, the minute a girl is found to be pregnant, they are asked to leave school immediately. They teach the girls some skills, like how to be housewives and how to take care of a baby. I taught sewing."

"I had culture shock when I went to Jamaica. One time this teacher who was supposed to teach the history class after my class didn't show up. I thought maybe he was sick. It was raining, and he lived across the street. So I called him, and he said he was waiting until the rain stopped because he had lost his umbrella. Here he was a bona fide teacher, and he didn't want to cross the street in the rain."

"But I began to learn that most people had that philosophy. Time just means very little to the people of Jamaica."

Did they educate you before you went?

"Yes, but I was not prepared. They gave us a three-day seminar in Florida before we left, but either I wasn't paying attention or I didn't believe the man, because I was shocked when I actually experienced the culture. Our teacher drew a square in the middle of the room and told us all to get inside it to show us what the buses are like in Jamaica. And he said, 'Come on, closer, closer.' And he had a stick and was herding us into the square. Well, it was exactly like that in Jamaica. But he went on to something else and just didn't emphasize it enough because those buses were terrible. People were absolutely packed in like sardines. They had a pole that would shove you in, and the buses were in terrible condition.

"Another thing they told us was that it was not polite to go through someone's gate. You were to rattle it, and someone would come out. But they didn't tell me why. It was because everyone has guard dogs, and one time I was almost attacked by two of them.

"I also learned that if you leave something out, not tied down, it would disappear. It wasn't considered stealing, it was just borrowing. And if you lent someone something, they'd lend it to someone else, and you'd never see it again. There was a sense that everything was communal property, I guess."

What was it like to come back to the United States?

"I had no home to come back to. I couldn't go back to Ohio. I was staying with my son in Nashville, wondering if I was nervy enough to start over again in some strange city. But then he was transferred to Singapore, and I couldn't follow him there. Here I was in Nashville, my kids are living in different places and independent. They didn't need me. Who was I? I was just an old woman living in a cheap little apartment. I was feeling a little blue in Nashville. I had been subject to melancholy when I lived in Cleveland, but I had forgotten about it. I remember one time feeling so blue that tears were coming out of my eyes, and I sat there with a pencil and paper trying to write down all of the things that were going through my body and mind. I knew it was not my imagination. I was living all alone in an austere apartment with blue walls and blue drapes."

Did you experience culture shock when you first moved to LA?

"Oh, yes, a tremendous one. First of all, people dressed differently here. Everyone was wearing sandals with no hose, and they were all laid back. Wherever I went I was over dressed. I couldn't get used to the fact that I was over dressed.

"And perfect strangers would say hello to me on the street, ask me how I was doing. You didn't see that in Ohio. One time a woman standing in line with me for something asked if I wanted to go to her party. What a shock. Why would a stranger ask me to their party? I thought maybe she was short on people.

"The social atmosphere was different, too. I was involved a little in politics in Cleveland, but here I just vote and send things to my children if I think it's important. And I get a lot of things on the e-mail.

"I have a funny feeling my son is a Republican. I never ask because I was afraid of getting an answer. I don't want to know. My son, a Republican?"

How did you end up in Santa Monica?

"I went to visit a friend in Los Angeles, and I remembered how much I liked it here. And I thought the sun would be good. So I ended up moving out here from Nashville after getting out of the Peace Corps, and I got an apartment in Santa Monica."

What do you like about Santa Monica?

"I'm very happy with their symphonies, and I go to every single one. And I love the library because I'm a voracious reader. I'm delighted they're building a new one, but I don't expect to live that long.

"Another thing I like is the public transportation here. I do drive, but I'll take the city bus sometimes to better acquaint myself with it. I also like the mixing of older and younger people, and of color here. This Sunday I'm going to a dinner for the Peace Corps members. There are a lot of young people there. In Ohio, people stay in their age group.

"I also like that when I tell people outside of Santa Monica where I live, they rarely ask me what state it's in. They've heard of it already. The only thing I don't like about this city is the frequency of parking tickets. I think I've paid the salary of a few meter maids."

What is it like to be a senior citizen in Santa Monica?

"I don't notice much of a difference, maybe because I don't belong to any senior organizations. I have a lot to do, and I have access to a lot of trips with the Docent Council. I volunteer with at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art."

What keeps you learning and changing?

"Remember, I waited until I was 60 to do it. And at that point I didn't need to support anybody and was getting social security. Basically I'm a lazy person. I have to push myself. I write a schedule down to do, otherwise I'll forget or it will be too easy to not do it.

"Mostly I stay involved. You can't survive if you don't stay involved. If I had someone supporting me, I'd be a student my whole life long.

"Another thing is I don't play games. I don't dislike them, there's nothing wrong with them, but I just don't really like them. I think it's kind of a passive type of recreation, and I don't do things passively. I do them because I want to. For instance, I don't watch much TV. Nothing wrong with it, it's a good time killer. But that's just it. I don't want to kill time. I don't have time for that."

Incumbents rally funds to defend council seats

Herb Katz; Arthur Coppola, the CEO of Macerich Co., which owns Santa Monica Place; Ted Braun, a spokesman for UCLA Hospital; and members of the Slatkin family, who have ownership interests in Shutters on the Beach.

Dinolfo reported spending $2,600 so far this month, mostly on his Web site, a couple of election mailers and advertisements both online and in print.

Hoffman's campaign also raised more than $10,000 during the first half of October. She brought in $11,600, which pushed her campaign total so far to nearly $20,000. Hoffman's donations came from, among others, Ruth Elwell, owner of Ye Olde King's Head; the executives who own Southern California Disposal; Mayor Richard Bloom; and Rent Control Board member Betty Mueller. Hoffman spent $2,100 during the same period, mostly on her campaign consultant, Web site, mailers and election advertisements, according to disclosure reports.

Trailing in fundraising the first half of October were challengers Kathryn Morea, a data analyst who raised $6,113, and Pico neighborhood activist Maria Loya, who brought in $6,050. Former newspaper columnist Bill Bauer reported $2,349 in donations this month. Four other council candidates — Leticia Anderson, Linda Armstrong, David Cole and Jonathan Mann — had nothing to report.

Incumbents also have kept busy at fundraising. City Councilman Ken Genser reported raising more than $25,000 in the first half of October, while Bloom brought in nearly $21,000. City Councilman Herb Katz raised $16,400 in the first part of October, and Michael Feinstein received donations of $2,700. Though Genser and Bloom had almost non-existent war chests before October, Katz already had raised $58,900. Feinstein had reported $22,300 in donations, plus $44,800 he lent to his campaign. He reported lending his campaign an additional $2,000 late last week.

In addition to the money they raise, candidates rely heavily on backing from local political groups, which spend money on their behalf. One major player is the Santa Monicans for Renters' Rights group, which raised $6,400 this month, bringing its year-to-date total to nearly $125,000, the reports show. SMRR, which also benefits from volunteer union canvassers, has thrown its support behind Hoffman, Loya, Bloom and Genser.

Another major player in the pending election just emerged this month. Called Santa Monicans for Change, the group so far has been funded solely by two major local luxury hotels, Casa Del Mar and Shutters on the Beach. It raised $170,000 this month alone to support a slate of candidates also endorsed by the local chamber of commerce. Dinolfo, Katz, Morea and Shriver make up the slate.

Outside groups weigh in on local election required to pay workers at least $10.25 an hour. The hotels also have lobbied for tougher laws against local vagrants.

As of Friday, the two hotels were the only contributors to "Santa Monicans for Change," a newly formed independent political committee that doesn't have to follow normal fundraising laws, but also can't personally communicate with City Council candidates. Much of the money has been spent on election mailers for City Councilman Herb Katz, and challengers Matt Dinolfo, Kathryn Morea and Bobby Shriver.

With their $170,000 in donations this month, Santa Monicans for Change far out-fundraised the powerful Santa Monicans for Renters' Rights Group, which has endorsed a majority of council members for nearly three decades. SMRR raised just $6,400 this month, bringing its yearly total to $125,000.

Seth Jacobsen, a spokesman for Santa Monicans for Change, has said a variety of merchants and residents belong to the group. But according to campaign disclosure documents filed at City Hall, only the two hotels, contributing $29,000 each, gave money during the first half of October. After the middle of October, candidates and political groups are only required to report donations of $1,000 or more. The hotels gave another $50,000 on Wednesday and $62,000 on Thursday, the documents show.

Meanwhile, another group calling itself "Santa Monica Citizens for Sensible Priorities" has sent out mailers criticizing City Hall with the same design as those sent by Santa Monicans for Change. Santa Monica Citizens for Sensible Priorities has avoided reporting its fundraising because it hasn't directly backed specific candidates, which is what election law dictates. It was formed solely to promote social welfare in Santa Monica, said the group's attorney, Barry Fadem.

Other outside groups also are raising money in their efforts to reach voters before the November election. Among the organizations that have raised and spent reportable amounts of money this month are the local police union and the local hotel and restaurant workers' union, each of which have raised thousands of dollars to promote their candidates of choice.

SoCal dam outlives its usefulness, but removing it presents a challenge

BY TIM MOLLOY
Associated Press Writer

OJAI — The Matilija Dam was designed to hold back water, but today it cradles mostly rocks and pebbles.

Decades worth of sediment are choking the reservoir it created — so much muck that a waterfall cascades over the dam's lip when just an inch of rain falls in the mountains northwest of Los Angeles.

Environmentalists and engineers agree that the dam has outlived its usefulness and should be removed. The benefits, they hope, would include the restoration of eroded beaches downstream and one less barrier to endangered southern steelhead trout struggling to reach spawning habitat inland.

The removal of the Matilija, by itself a massive undertaking, is part of a nationwide effort by environmentalists and government agencies to restore dammed rivers where wildlife suffers and coastlines are deprived of silt that replenishes land lost to erosion.

"For a long time we looked at the benefits of water development — dams, levees and such — and ignored the costs," said Daniel McCool, a University of Utah political science professor who studies environmental issues. "Now the things that were damaged by the levees and dams are the things that we value."

Among other restoration projects:

On Washington's Olympic Peninsula, planning is under way to dismantle the 108-foot-tall Elwha Dam and the 210-foot-tall Glines Canyon Dam as part of a $182 million plan to restore the Elwha River, reopening 70 miles of salmon and steelhead habitat.

Environmentalists want to restore the Louisiana coastline, harmed by dams and channels on the Mississippi. In central Florida, ecologists are removing man-made channels from the Kissimmee River that destroyed wetlands and plant and animal life.

At least 145 dams have been dismantled in the last five years because they were unsafe, outlasted their usefulness, or degraded land and wildlife, according to Blair Greimann, a hydraulic engineer with the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation.

Greimann is studying the 198-foot-tall Matilija to prepare for its removal, which won't begin until at least 2007. A proposed plan has been presented to the public for comment, and funding will need to come mostly from Congress.

The dam was built in 1947 to harness Ventura River water for small communities such as Ojai, a peaceful town known for its art galleries and spas. Now, so much has settled that only 800,000 cubic yards of water skim 6 million cubic yards of sediment — enough to bury a football field two-thirds of a mile deep.

Jeff Pratt, director of the Ventura County Watershed Protection District which is leading the removal effort, said the sediment makes the reservoir all but useless. The local water district says it could tap the supply during a severe drought.

The dam is also bad news for fish. Before it was built, an estimated 5,000 steelhead swam the Ventura River, but fewer than 100 do today.

To help what fish remain, engineers designed a series of small pools leading to a holding pond where the trout would be picked up and driven upstream by truck. But rocks carried over the dam by water broke the fish ladder.

The leading proposal for removing the dam calls for gradually pumping 2 million cubic yards of mud to the flood plain downstream. After temporarily stabilizing the rest of the sediment, crews would probably use jackhammers and small explosives to break the dam down a section at a time, said Pam Lindsey, a watershed district ecologist.

"It's not just something that you can go in there and remove in a day," said Steve Evans, conservation director of the Friends of the River, which monitors dam removals across California.

Part of the dam is already gone. Workers took out slabs built with materials that engineers said were subpar, reducing the dam's height to 165 feet in the middle, as if creating a channel at the top.

As the rest is removed, the watershed district is promising to take steps to avoid flooding along the 16 miles of the river that lead to the Pacific Ocean.

The riverbank ranges from lushly shaded to dry and craggy where the river goes underground.

Among the land that could be partially flooded is the riverside estate of Brooks Greene-Barton, a former real estate broker who now conducts spiritual seminars. Greene-Barton supports the dam's removal, even though he and his wife were in escrow to sell the 10-acre property for $3 million when the prospective buyer backed out because of flooding concerns.

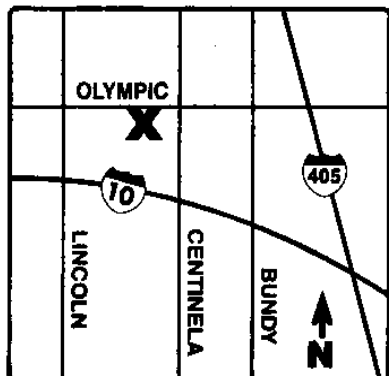

Instead of filing suit, Greene-Barton hopes to help the project by leasing his land to the district. As an added benefit, he would retain the lush riverbank where his two Labrador retrievers can still play.

"If you love trees and you love the forest — they come back," he said.

STATE

State wildfire recovery depends on where people live

BY ELLIOT SPAGAT

Associated Press Writer

SAN DIEGO — After last year's wildfires destroyed 312 homes in the upscale Scripps Ranch area, displaced homeowners banded together. They negotiated with contractors as a group, figuring that would be the quickest, cheapest way to rebuild.

In Harrison Park, a mountain enclave 60 miles to the east, residents turned against each other after fire claimed 170 homes. As they sought building permits, they discovered their property lines weren't where they thought — the result of poor land surveys performed decades ago.

The confusion has left the rebuilding effort there in turmoil.

"Neighbor has gone against neighbor, husband has gone against wife," said Neva Anderson, 83, who was told that her property line slices through the middle of her former home. Now she's living in a camper in her driveway, with no plans to rebuild.

The tales of Scripps Ranch and Harrison Park depict two extremes in the effort to recover from the firestorms of a year ago this month — the most destructive wildfires in recent California history. In many ways, the pace of recovery has come down to where people live.

Urban neighborhoods are rebuilding more quickly, bolstered by higher household incomes, better roads and sewers, and tight-knit organizations that know how to pressure government officials and insurance companies.

Mountain villages have lagged, hampered by haphazard construction and a go-it-alone spirit that has left residents fending for themselves.

"Overall things seem to be moving a little bit faster than other disasters, but there's such a wide range," said George Kehrer, executive director of Community Assisting Recovery Inc., a nonprofit group that assists homeowners. "A lot of it comes down to organization."

The wildfires devastated enormous swaths of land across five Southern California counties. For nearly a week in late October 2003, flames swallowed neatly planned, urban subdivisions as well as hardscrabble villages and vacation getaways in the mountains.

When the smoke cleared, 24 people were dead, more than 3,600 homes had been destroyed and 750,000 acres had burned.

A year later, only 145 of the 2,516 homes lost in San Diego County — the hardest hit area — have been rebuilt. Construction permits have been issued for another 837 dwellings.

To make matters worse for some homeowners, a number of insurance companies pay living expenses for just a year after a disaster, leaving many people reaching into their pockets to cover rent.

Though the numbers may appear low, it's rare for anyone to rebuild in less than a year after a major disaster. California Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi said it took three to five years for most people to rebuild after the 1991 Oakland fire destroyed more than 3,000 homes.

Across Southern California, rebuilding efforts have been hampered by heavy demand for contractors and building supplies. Lumber prices have increased 8 percent since the summer and the cost of steel reinforcing bar has jumped 35 percent, according to Community Assisting Recovery.

Underinsurance has also been widespread. Adam Richardson, a technology consultant, put his Scripps Ranch home up for sale and is suing his insurance company for allegedly misleading him about the coverage he needed. Attorneys expect more than 300 such lawsuits related to the wildfires.

While some obstacles to rebuilding are common throughout the region, the differences between urban subdivisions and mountain villages may be just as important.

Consider Scripps Ranch, a community of 30,000 people in the heart of San Diego where homes sold for an average price of $758,529 in September.

Only six of the 312 homes lost to the fire have been rebuilt. But the city has issued permits for 251 more. These days, its winding streets are busy with construction crews and lined with partially built houses.

The Scripps Ranch Civic Association — which pumps out 100-page monthly newsletters covering everything from the Girl Scouts to youth basketball games — encouraged homeowners to negotiate with contractors as a group.

Eventually, 81 property owners settled on Stonefield Development, an Orange County builder.

Stonefield offered seven floor plans, priced from $93 to $98 a square foot — about half of what many custom builders were asking. The first of the 81 homes will be finished in January, with the rest completed by April, said Julie Pack, vice president of sales and marketing.

Karen Reimus, whose home on a cul-de-sac was destroyed, said she had no choice but to go with Stonefield. Her insurance policy, purchased four months before the fire, left her $150,000 short of the cost of replacing exactly what she lost.

Scripps Ranch also turned up the heat on elected officials. About 300 people packed a school auditorium in April to tell Garamendi that he needed to get tougher with insurance companies.

Reimus, a lawyer, was one of seven Scripps Ranch homeowners who later went to Sacramento to promote Garamendi's legislative agenda. The insurance commissioner called last month to wish her a happy 38th birthday.

"Some other communities have modest organizations but nothing like Scripps Ranch," Garamendi said.

In mountain towns, however, homeowners are mostly on their own.

In Harrison Park, many lots are still littered with old stoves, broken concrete slabs and other debris from the fire. Many displaced homeowners are still living in campers; some are in tents.

Unlike Scripps Ranch — where about 70 percent of the homes were built after 1980 and meticulously planned — Harrison Park got its start in the 1920s and slowly became a hodgepodge of odd-shaped lots with no two houses looking alike. Quail, wild turkey and deer roamed the forested hills of pine, cedar, oak and manzanita trees.

The confusion over property lines brought reconstruction to a standstill after the fires. In May, county Supervisor Dianne Jacob split the community into a dozen sections and asked each to peacefully settle their differences. She's still waiting for their solutions.

Manuel Machado, 69, a retired building contractor who built his home himself on land that his wife's family has owned since 1926, is livid about one neighbor who claims 40 feet of what Machado thought was his land. He figures he's entitled to 20 feet of another neighbor's property but is reluctant to make a claim.

"Somewhere along the way, someone is going to get squeezed," he said. "No one can stay where they are. They all have to move over and destroy one another."

Harrison Park, like other mountain communities, has a host of other problems, from poor sewage to a remote location that takes construction crews time to reach. Many people simply don't have the money to rebuild.

With daytime temperatures already in the mid-40s, bad weather may slow construction even more during the winter.

Machado looked out the window of the $41,000 pre-fabricated home he bought with insurance money and counted 10 campers parked on a burned hillside.

"They're going to be very cold," he said. "You have to go through an awful lot of propane to heat those up, and it's very depressing to stay in a little box like that."

The end of living expenses from insurers poses another hardship.

Jim McDonald, 48, who lost his home in the San Diego County mountain community of Crest, will be leaving a furnished home this month with his wife and 11 children. They'll be moving into a place that rents for half as much as the $3,500 a month his insurance carrier had been paying.

McDonald, who runs the seafood department at a supermarket, doesn't expect his replacement home to be finished for several months. He carries a poem written by his 21-year-old daughter that reads, in part: "Will our house ever be built?"

Feds: No impact on fish from Delta water shift

BY DON THOMPSON
Associated Press Writer

SACRAMENTO — A federal agency ruled Friday that shifting more Northern California water to Southern California will not jeopardize five threatened or endangered species of fish.

The ruling clears the way for the federal Bureau of Reclamation and state Department of Water Resources to sign long-term water contracts with rural irrigation districts and urban water districts. They also can continue with plans to pump more water through the fragile Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta to thirsty Southern California.

Environmental groups have fought the expected decision by NOAA Fisheries, formerly known as the National Marine Fisheries Service, alleging it was politically motivated.

They cite draft biological opinions that said the water transfer would imperil the fish.

Jim Lecky, NOAA Fisheries’ assistant regional administrator for protective resources, denied any outside influence or improper altering of the final decision.

Changing the ultimate recommendation was “just typical project management oversight and supervision,” Lecky said. “There was some analysis that was faulty and needed to get a second look, and that’s what we did.”

The three major species at the heart of the opinion are the Sacramento River winter chinook run, the Central Valley spring chinook run, and the Central Valley steelhead. Also considered was danger to Southern Oregon-Northern California Coast coho salmon and Central Coast steelhead.

The 350-page decision concludes none are likely to be jeopardized.

It includes requirements to try to minimize fish kills by maintaining cold water in the Sacramento River to aid winter run salmon and establishing fish kill thresholds that would require the Bureau of Reclamation to stop pumping water through the Delta, Lecky said.

A task force would help set cold water requirements each May 1, based largely on how much water had been stored from the winter rain and snowfall, he said.

Friday’s decision “will become the underpinning ... of long-term contracts that the bureau will consider later this year,” Lecky said.

The federal reclamation bureau and state water department want to integrate their parallel reservoir and pumping systems, sign dozens of water contracts lasting 25 to 40 years, and send 27 percent more water south through the state’s Harvey O. Banks Pumping Plant near Stockton.

California’s two Democratic U.S. senators and a half-dozen Democratic House members, including House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, have called for delays and more information before water regulators act.

Barry Nelson of the Natural Resources Defense Council criticized the agency for signing the biological opinion before the inspector generals of the Commerce and Interior departments complete their investigations of whether the reclamation bureau improperly influenced NOAA Fisheries to alter initial draft findings that the water transfer could endanger fish species.

“What the bureau is attempting to do is bring Klamath-style management to the Bay and Delta,” Nelson said. The reference was to alleged political influence on federal decisions affecting the Klamath River in Northern California and south-central Oregon that allegedly contributed to one of the nation’s largest fish kills in 2002.

Nelson, also criticized the state and federal water agencies for continuing with the proposed water transfers unilaterally, instead of working through the open and collaborative California Federal Bay-Delta Program, commonly known as CalFed. He had not seen Friday’s decision and could not comment on its specifics.

Police: DNA links prison inmate to dozen LA slayings

BY TIM MOLLOY
Associated Press Writer

LOS ANGELES — A man serving a prison sentence after pleading no contest to rape has been linked by DNA evidence to the killings of a dozen women, including three that another man was convicted of committing, police said Saturday.

Police plan to give prosecutors evidence next week against 37-year-old Chester D. Turner. He may eventually be linked to as many as a dozen other killings, Los Angeles Police Department Chief William J. Bratton said.

In a somber coincidence, the mothers of two of the victims have been friends for 30 years, and have grieved together for their daughters’ deaths.

“He’ll never be able to do this to someone else’s child,” said Jerri Johnson, whose 29-year-old daughter, Andrea Triplett, was among the victims. “No family will have to go through what we went through.”

Johnson’s daughter was found dead in 1993, six years and several blocks north of where the body of 26-year-old Annette Ernest, the daughter of Johnson’s friend, Mildred White, also was found.

“We never thought that it could be the same person,” White said.

Triplett and Ernest each had two young children, and Triplett was pregnant with a third when she was killed.

Turner is serving an eight-year sentence at the Sierra Conservation Center state prison near Stockton after pleading no contest to rape in 2002.

The former pizza deliveryman allegedly accosted most of his victims on a street in South-Central Los Angeles, raping and strangling them, then dumping their bodies.

Before police identified Turner as a suspect, a mentally disabled janitor was wrongly convicted of three of the killings and spent nearly nine years in prison. David Allen Jones, 44, was released in March.

The 12 women were killed between 1987 and 1998, most of them within a 30-block area known for drugs, violence and prostitution. Their slayings remained unsolved until the LAPD’s cold case homicide unit began looking into them.

Bratton said the six detectives in the cold case unit weren’t able to link Turner to the crimes until now because they have a backlog of thousands of cases, many of which had to be handled before the statute of limitations expired.

Detective Cliff Shepard, who brought one of the cases with him when he transferred to the newly formed unit in 2001, submitted DNA evidence obtained from the victim’s body to the police department’s crime lab. The evidence matched that found in two other cases, one involving a 1996 murder and the other a 2002 rape in which the victim escaped her attacker.

Campaign finale draws foot-in-mouth rhetoric

BY TOM RAUM
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — As the presidential race winds down, the two camps are dialing up the rhetoric. That's led to some far-out statements, unscripted behavior and foot-in-mouth comments from both sides.

Generating homestretch shock waves were Vice President Dick Cheney's nuclear-bomb terror warnings for U.S. cities, Sen. John Kerry's efforts to blame President Bush for flu vaccine shortages and Teresa Heinz Kerry's suggestion that Laura Bush never had a "real job."

Heinz Kerry apologized, saying she "forgot" that the first lady worked for 10 years as a teacher and librarian.

The comment, which could hurt Kerry among undecided women voters who are stay-at-home moms, appeared to reflect the enormous pressures on both campaigns in a close race.

"Part of what's happening is the consequence of all the tensions and anxieties from the fact that neither candidate made a big move in the polls after the debates. We're left with the same dead heat we had at the start," said Wayne Fields, an expert in presidential rhetoric at Washington University in St. Louis.

Republicans are still seething at Kerry for mentioning Cheney's openly gay daughter in the final presidential debate. "I thought it was over the line," Bush said last week in an interview with The Associated Press. Kerry has said he was just complimenting the Cheneys on their parenting.

And then there was the claim by Pat Robertson that God told him Iraq would be "messy," but that Bush assured the religious broadcaster in early 2003 there would be no U.S. casualties. Bush aides denied the president said any such thing.

With people concerned about the economy and Iraq, both candidates are turning to extreme politics to try to nudge the needle in their favor.

Kerry accuses Bush of pondering a revival of the military draft and planning a "January surprise" on Social Security. Bush labels the Massachusetts senator an unrepentant tax-and-spend "liberal" too wishy-washy to stand up to the terrorist threat.

Each suggests the other would lead the country toward despair, defeat, towering debt.

"Everybody's beginning to recognize the stakes of this election are huge, both campaigns are tired, and they appear to be letting it all hang out," said GOP consultant Scott Reed, who ran Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign.

Flu vaccine was not an issue in the debates. Since then, it has become a major one.

Kerry claimed — and the administration denied — that Bush aides got advance word of a supply disruption and did nothing about it. Kerry said the inability to get the vaccine to Americans was "a serious demonstration of the failure of leadership."

Democrats criticized Cheney and leading Republicans for getting their shots while those officials were urging healthy people to forgo inoculations to free up supplies. Cheney, who has a history of heart disease, did so at the advice of his doctor, aides said. Bush, Kerry and running mate John Edwards are skipping the shots.

Cheney has stepped up his attacks on Kerry's fitness to be commander in chief. Last week he called Kerry unsuited for dealing with the "ultimate threat" of terrorists who bombed U.S. cities with nuclear weapons.

Cheney's earlier claim that a CIA report concluding that Saddam Hussein had no weapons of mass destruction actually reinforced the administration's case for going to war led Edwards to say Bush and Cheney were "completely out of touch with reality."

Had enough mudslinging?

If not, there always is independent candidate Ralph Nader. He says this year's election presents voters with a choice between "heart disease and cancer."

The close race also seems to be producing gaffes that reinforce negative stereotypes; for instance, Bush as language-challenged and Kerry as vain and aloof.

In a New Jersey speech on terrorism, Bush asserted: "We will finish the work we have started. We will stand up for terror, we will stand up for freedom."

The next day he joked to supporters in Florida: "In the last few years, the American people have gotten to know me. They know my blunt way of speaking. I get that from Mother. They know I sometimes mangle the English language. I get that from Dad."

Kerry went hunting for geese in Ohio — hoping for a photo op that would sway gun-owning voters. But when he bought a nonresident hunting license he seemed stumped when asked by a clerk what hair color should be entered into the computer to describe the buyer.

"Salt and pepper," the graying candidate said. When told by the clerk that the system would only let him pick a simple color, Kerry settled for gray.

Close election doesn't have to stay that way

BY RON FOURNIER

AP Political Writer

WASHINGTON — The presidential race is too close to project a winner right now, but that doesn't mean it will be too close on Election Day to prevent a landslide.

Winner-take-all Electoral College math could convert a modest burst of momentum from President Bush or Sen. John Kerry into a sweep of tossup states — and a presidential mandate.

It's easy to understand why the race could end in another nail-biting recount like 2000. As it stands now, with the popular vote evenly divided or Bush slightly ahead in most polls, 30 states plus the District of Columbia are firmly for Kerry or Bush. In addition:

■ Six states are leaning toward the Democrat (Hawaii, New Jersey, Washington state, Maine, Oregon and Michigan) for a total of 207 electoral votes solidly or marginally in Kerry's column.

■ Six are leaning toward Bush (Arizona, Missouri, Arkansas, North Carolina, West Virginia and Colorado) for 222 electoral votes solidly or marginally behind the incumbent.

That leaves both men short of the 270 needed to win the presidency, a majority of the 538 available. In a close race, the battle to 270 will play out in nine remaining states where polls show the candidates within 3 percentage points of each other — Florida, Ohio, Nevada, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Iowa, New Mexico, Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The tossup states have a combined 109 electoral votes. Making matters tighter, the race in Michigan grew closer last week and is now barely leaning Kerry. Both campaigns are nervous, fearing the next mistake will tip the election.

In this anxious environment, Bush and Kerry are making strategic decisions based on the assumption that that the popular vote will be evenly divided and every Electoral College vote will count. Thus, in the final weeks of the campaign, they pulled money out of second-tier battlegrounds like Missouri and Oregon to focus on the few states that are most likely to get them to 270.

That doesn't mean the dozen second-tier battlegrounds can't come into play.

What happens if it's not such a close race? Assume for a moment that this volatile campaign takes one more modest swing before Election Day — a gentle nudge of the pendulum — and Bush or Kerry break away by 3 or 4 percentage points.

That's the margin of error for most polls, but enough to tilt every tossup state to a single candidate.

Bush's 222 electoral votes become 331, an electoral landslide.

Kerry's 207 becomes 316, not shabby.

If the president's momentum buys him another percentage point or two, suddenly Democratic-leaning Michigan, Maine and Oregon are in play. Even Washington state, New Jersey and Hawaii — all too Democratic to warrant TV ads or candidate visits — are within single digits of Bush's grasp.

Same for Kerry: If two thirds of persuadable voters break his way, which they often do for a challenger, the Democrat could pick up GOP-leaning West Virginia and Colorado to put him at 330 electoral votes.

Former President Clinton wants Kerry to campaign in Arkansas in case the election breaks his way. Louisiana and Virginia can't be too far behind.

Arizona, Missouri and North Carolina are too Republican to warrant ads or candidate visits in a close race, but they are in play if Kerry opens a lead.

"I've always thought that the undecided voters were going to break in mass one way," said Republican consultant Scott Reed. "They're looking for that final level of comfort for their vote."

Republicans hope that late-deciding voters make their choice based on national security, that they fear the risk of change in an unsettled world.

An AP-Ipsos-Public Affairs poll shows that wavering voters — those undecided or still willing to change their mind — support Bush over Kerry on national security. They are also more skeptical of the president and opposed to the war in Iraq than other voters, giving Democrats hope.

"I'm absolutely sure that all of these polls are underrepresenting key Democratic constituencies in a significant way," Democratic strategist Jim Jordan said. "Couple that with what I think is our superior ground game and, even if Kerry is tied in polls, it's absolutely possible he takes every one" of the tossup states.

It's possible that one candidate could rack up big margins in the Electoral College while barely winning the popular vote. Or, as happened to Gore in 2000, a candidate could win the popular vote but not the Electoral College.

"The math adds up a lot of different ways," Jordan said.

We run everyday.
