TRAVERSE EXCHANGE

Your health.
Your data.
Your care.

At Redington-Fairview General Hospital, we're serious about data privacy and security. That's why we allow you to decide who has access to your data.

We believe that your health data should be available to you and your care providers regardless of where care was provided, which is why we practice the safest, most secure form of health data sharing.

When you choose to share your health information, you can be confident that only individuals and organizations authorized by law can access it for legitimate purposes. You can also trust that data is protected end-to-end — so no one else can see it.

By “opting in” to secure data sharing, you ensure that clinicians providing care for you at other organizations have the information they need to make the best and safest care decisions for you.

FAQs

How can I be sure my data is safe?

Electronic sharing is much more secure than a fax or paper file, which can be lost or viewed by unauthorized persons. Access to your electronic health data is tightly controlled and monitored.

Who can see my information?

Under HIPAA, your health records are kept private and secure, allowing only authorized providers to access them. You can choose which care teams may access and share your health information to better coordinate your care.

What information is shared?

Important patient health information, such as medical history, test results, and medication lists may be shared, empowering your care team to make better treatment decisions and ensuring that you receive coordinated care. Access to the right information allows providers to work together more effectively to support your health.

How do I opt out?

If you do not want your health information included in our information exchange, notify any member of our health care team and your demographic information will be updated appropriately.
